ROYAL PATRONAGE TO A BRITISH FIRM.

Extract from the "Morning Post," November 27th, 1909.

"Messrs. CHALLEN & SON, the firm of Pianoforte Makers, had the honour of a visit to their Showrooms at Hanover Street, W., yesterday from His Majesty The King of Portugal—who was accompanied by his Excellency the Marquis de Soveral. His Majesty was pleased to select one of Messrs. Challen & Son's new Short Grands, which he commanded to be sent to Lisbon. His Majesty afterwards accorded a special audience to Mr. C. H. Challen at Buckingham Palace."

CHALLEN & SON,
HANOVER STREET, W. (Late of 46, Oxford Street, W.).

Established 1804.

J. & P. SCHIEDMAYER

MDE. CLARA BUTT

WRITES AS FOLLOWS:—

"The Tone is magnificent, it is delightful to sing to. I recommend every singer to have a

SCHIEDMAYER PIANO,
it is such a help to the voice."

THE MALKIN
PATENT PEDAL ATTACHMENT

All Organists should write for particulars of above attachment. It is the latest invention, most up-to-date, the simplest, best and cheapest attachment on the market, absolutely noiseless, is easily fixed by any amateur, and will not injure the most delicate pianoforte.

OUR NEW AND EXCLUSIVE OCTAVE ATTACHMENT is the Greatest Advance in Pedal Attachments since their introduction.

The following testimonial is one of many—

DEAR SIR, Brampton, Cumberland.

After an exhaustive examination and trial of your attachment, I am well satisfied that it is the best on the market for simplicity and durability, noiseless and perfect repetition, and non-injurious to any piano. It cannot be beaten, and the moderate price should guarantee a large sale.

Yours faithfully,

F. DIGGLE, Mus. Bac., A.R.C.O.

VALUE OF THE COURSE.

A MUS. BAC. writes: "I would not be without your exercises for ten times the fee."

Another MUS. BAC. says: "I am fully satisfied that I have never spent three guineas to greater advantage in all my musical life."

OTHER PUPILS SAY:

"The £3 3s. is the best outlay I have ever made in my efforts to learn the piano."

"Your course is worth far more than a great many 'quarters' of lessons—in the ordinary sense of the word—put together."

"I consider your lessons a splendid return for the money."

"I would have spent three times as much by the ordinary methods to have obtained the same execution, not to mention the great saving in time."

"I have never spent three guineas to better purpose in my life."

TO PLAY MUSIC AT SIGHT.

The great stumbling-block with nearly all pianists, whether they be advanced students or mere beginners, is their inability to play music at first sight. Years of daily practising may give you that ability, but a much greater proficiency can be obtained by the aid of my System in three months of about a quarter of an hour's daily practice. Hundreds of students have taken my Course of Correspondence Lessons with remarkable success. Here are a few extracts taken from their reports:—

"My improvement in general reading is very rapid."

"I am certainly deriving great benefit."

"Am surprised myself at being able to read chords so much better."

"It is now quite a pleasure to take up new music."

"I consider my progress very marked."

Booklet, containing a full explanation of the methods employed, sent gratis and post-free to any pianist on application to Mr. L. M. ERHEMAYER, 27, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ANTONIO STRADIVARI

HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice." The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

(BARITONE).

Of the Leeds Musical Festival, Leeds Choral Union and Philharmonic Society, Newcastle and Antestehs Choral Union, Queen's Hall, Alexandra Palace, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Birmingham, Liverpool and Principal Provincial Concerts.

"ELIJAH" at HUDDERSFIELD.—"Mr. Herbert Parker, richly musical and sonorous over the wide range of his voice, sang the music of the Prophet with faultless intonation, remarkable accuracy and flexible freedom, and extraordinary dramatic power, dignity, and beauty of pathos, prayerfulness and finish. His interpretation was so vividly illuminating as to bring the great central character almost like a fine personation that could be seen. His singing in the great scene ending with the raising of the widow's son was wonderfully powerful and artistic, and he was very strong and dignified, with the right touch of banter, in the Baal scene. He declaimed 'Is not His word' with fine fire and fluency, his singing of 'It is enough' was beautiful in pathos and dramatic expression, and he sang 'For the mountains shall depart' with chaste smoothness and finish. It is a long while since we heard Elijah so powerfully and perfectly portrayed alike from musical and expressive points of view."

Huddersfield Examiner, December 17, 1909.
"ELIJAH" at LEAMINGTON.—"Mr. Herbert Parker as Elijah gave distinct tone to the whole performance. He had thoroughly conceived the spirit which is its essential characteristic, and in his hands the part of the great prophet was fully invested with reverent dramatic force. The aria 'Is not His word like a fire' was sung with great intensity and conviction, and memorable also was his appeal for the return of the spirit to the widow's son, the entire vocal duologue being most impressively rendered. In a word, Mr. Parker's conception throughout was very fine, and he has the voice to give articulation to his conception."—Courier, December 3rd, 1909.

"THE APOSTLES" at LEEDS.—"Mr. Herbert Parker also sang successfully and with fitting dramatic point in the rôle of Peter, for which his voice may be said to be thoroughly adapted."

Leeds Mercury, November 5, 1909.
"CREATION" at HANLEY.—"Mr. Herbert Parker once more proved what an exceptionally fine singer he is. Rolling in foaming billows" was given with exactly the right spirit, whilst 'Now heaven in fullest glory shone' served to show the beautiful finish of his voice. His smooth delivery, complete grasp of the music, and fine gradations of tone stamped him as an artist."

Staffordshire Advertiser, October 9, 1909.
Address: "Rosslyn," Lichfield.

MR. WILLIAM BURT

(BASS-BARITONE).

"I recommend Mr. William Burt as a thoroughly competent and reliable vocalist and musician."—ALLEN GILL.
"Devonia," St. Albans. Tel.: 141 St. Albans.

ROBIN OVERLEIGH

(BASS-BARITONE).

"ELIJAH" (Weybridge, April 26).—"The performance was specially noteworthy for the fine interpretation of the outstanding rôle by Mr. Robin Overleigh. This singer ranged up and down the entire gamut of the emotions. He was in turn supplicating, dramatic, derisive, passionate, declamatory, despairing, serene. His voice accommodated itself to every mood, and its fine timbre responded readily to each new demand."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

ESTABLISHED 1844.

PUBLISHED ON THE FIRST OF EVERY MONTH.

The death of Mr. F. G. Edwards hastens some changes in the character of the contents of THE MUSICAL TIMES that for some time have been contemplated. A special feature of the Journal during recent years has been the illustrated articles on cathedrals, churches, and public institutions, to the compilation of which it may be claimed that the late Editor brought great zeal and exceptional natural aptitude for the investigation and marshalling of details. It was obvious that this interesting and unique series could not be permanently maintained, if only because of the exhaustion of subject-matter. These considerations and the commencement of a volume have suggested that the time is opportune for a new departure. The space previously devoted to illustrated articles will now be occupied mainly by critical, historical, and educational matter that will, it is hoped, appeal to a large class of readers and be generally not less interesting and useful than the series more or less abandoned. The rapid and, to many people, bewildering developments of modern music will receive a due proportion of critical attention, and the progress of music in church, chapel, and concert hall, with which THE MUSICAL TIMES has always been closely associated, will receive all the record and encouragement that can be given.

The Journal will contain, as heretofore, notices of all important musical events in London and the Provinces, Foreign Notes and Reviews, Answers to Correspondents, etc. It will thus comprehensively survey the whole field of musical activity in a form which, it is believed, will be acceptable and helpful to readers at home and abroad.

The Music and other Supplements will be continued.

The price will be reduced to Threepence; Annual Subscription, including postage, Four Shillings. The music published in each number, when purchased separately, will be sold, as before, at Three-halfpence.

FREDERICK GEORGE EDWARDS.

BORN, OCTOBER 11, 1853.

DIED, NOVEMBER 28, 1909.

To some of us the musical outlook this month resembles a stricken battle-field. At the season when peace, joy and hope should reign our harps are tuned to notes of sadness. None of the losses it is our mournful duty to record affects us more severely than that of Frederick George Edwards, who was Editor of the Musical Times from April, 1897, up to the time of his death. He was seized with illness on November 18, and he paid his last visit to our office on that day. Pleurisy and pneumonia supervened, and on Sunday, November 28, heart failure carried him away in the presence of his wife, son, and daughter. He died at his residence, Canfield, Potters Bar, Middlesex.

The funeral took place at Potters Bar Cemetery on December 2, and was attended by many relatives and friends. Wreaths were sent by the Royal Academy of Music, the Association of North London Presbyterian Choirs, Sir George Martin, Mr. and Mrs. Ben Davies, and other musicians and personal friends. The Rev. Arthur Outram, Vicar of Christ Church, Little Heath, and the Rev. Dr. Monro Gibson conducted the service, which was held at the family residence. Sir Walter Parratt played In Memoriam music during even-song at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, on the day of the funeral, and memorial hymns were sung on the Sunday following, in many churches and chapels. At Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, one of Mr. Edwards's tunes was sung to the hymn, 'I will lay me down in peace,' the whole congregation standing.

Mr. Edwards came of an Essex family, and he was born in London on October 11, 1853. He was first educated at a Brixton Hill boarding-school and afterwards at Dedham Grammar School, and (in 1868) at King's College, London. In 1869 he entered a business house in the City of London. This afforded him an experience of orderly methods that was of great value to him in after life. Even while at school he had acquired some skill in organ-playing, and he now took lessons from Mr. William Beavan, of St. Mary's Church, Kilburn, and later from Mr. Henry Frost, organist of the Chapel Royal, Savoy. The young organist was soon able to deputise and even to give recitals, and in 1873 he played in Exeter Hall. In 1872 the Rev. Newman Hall invited Mr. Edwards to play the organ and train the choir in connection with some special services given in St. James's Hall. On July 20, 1873, as his very interesting diary records, he was invited to play at the Rev. Newman Hall's then famous Surrey Chapel (in Blackfriars Road), and on September 20 he was appointed organist. The singing in this circular chapel (long ago disused as a place of worship) was chiefly congregational, and as there were often between two and three thousand persons present the effect was inspiring.

The success of his work at Surrey Chapel, and the vista of teaching engagements it opened up, led Mr. Edwards, in 1875, to resolve to abandon business and to qualify himself more seriously for the profession by entering the Royal Academy of Music. At this institution, which has trained so many well-known British musicians, he studied organ-playing under Dr. Steggall and passed through the regular curriculum.

In July, 1876, Mr. Edwards migrated with the Surrey Chapel congregation to the newly-built Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road. A fine organ by Lewis was erected in the new edifice, and was a luxury much appreciated by Mr. Edwards and many well-known solo players of the day.

On one occasion the late Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone attended a service. A few days later, at one of his celebrated breakfast parties, the Rev. Newman Hall being on one side and Dean Church on the other, the great statesman spoke with high approval of the organ accompaniments, and added that he thought organists were often prone to display themselves and their instruments rather than to assist the devotion of worshippers. The Rev. Newman Hall at once wrote down this testimony, and asked Mr. Gladstone to sign it, because such an opinion would greatly encourage his young organist. Mr. Gladstone expressed his surprise at the youthfulness of the player and granted the request, and the document is now amongst the numerous valuable autographs cherished by the family. The following is the text:

MEM.—The Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., having attended worship at Christ Church, Westminster Road, on Sunday evening, June 2, 1878, expressed his approbation of the practical nature of the performance of the organist—who seemed anxious to promote the efficiency of the worship, and not to exhibit his instrument or himself.

(Signed) W. E. GLADSTONE.

June 13, 1878.

Increasing demands upon Mr. Edwards's time forced him to leave the Academy in 1877, but he continued to study counterpoint and composition under Mr. James Higgs. In 1879 he sought and obtained help of a far more enduring character by marrying Miss Lydia Jessie Williams. It is a very remarkable coincidence that his loving and loved companion, who now with resignation mourns her loss, was born on the same day and in the same year as himself. In his merry moods, and happily they were frequent, he would momentarily daze new friends by gravely stating that not only were he and his wife born on the same day, but by another remarkable coincidence they were married on the same day!

In 1881, Mr. Edwards resigned his organistship at Christ Church and accepted a like post at St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, where the pastor was and still is the Rev. Dr. Monro Gibson. At this period he began those literary-musical studies which have been the chief accomplishment of his life. In 1885 he undertook the editorship of 'Common Praise,' and this book was published in 1887. Later he wrote a series of articles on the Brontë family, which appeared in the British Weekly. In 1891 he contributed his first article to the Musical Times, then under the editorship of the late Dr. W. A. Barrett. It was on Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' and it revealed that trend in the direction of a deep appreciation of Mendelssohn's life and music that developed so strongly in later years. Another article from his facile pen appeared in the Musical Times for November, 1892, and was on musical settings of Tennyson's lyrics. Books written or edited about this period were 'The Romance of Psalter and Hymnal,' 'United Praise,' 'Musical Haunts in London,' 'Selected Psalms for Chanting,' 'A History of Mendelssohn's Elijah' (an absorbingly interesting and valuable book), sketches of the lives of Sir George Grove (with whom Mr. Edwards had a voluminous correspondence, all of which is methodically filed) and Dr. E. J. Hopkins. Meanwhile he was (from 1887 to 1897) assisting to answer correspondents of The Musical Herald, and later he contributed many important articles, (the chief of which is that on Arthur Sullivan), to Leslie Stephen's monumental 'Dictionary of National Biography' and to Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians.' Another still later contribution to historical literature was his share in the Catalogue of the exhibition of the Musicians' Company. From 1906 until his death he contributed regularly to The Guardian, under the signature of 'Diapason,' a series of 'Notes on Church music.'

In 1905 Mr. Edwards resigned the organistship of St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, in order to devote himself more completely to literary work. The esteem and deep regard felt for him by the congregation found some expression in handsome presentations made to him on his retirement. The twenty-four years' service at this place of worship was one of the happiest and proudest of Mr. Edwards's memories.

Last year he began what promised to become for him a new field of activity. He lectured before large audiences in Edinburgh and Glasgow on 'The importance of praise in the Church service.'

It may not be meet that, in these columns, all concerned during recent years in the production of this journal should express fully their admiration, respect and regard for their late chief. But at this juncture some personal tribute may be excused. They would like to record their appreciation of the ability and painstaking which Mr. Edwards brought to bear not only upon his own ample contributions, but upon the general ordering and tone of the journal. In his onerous and often difficult work he displayed a consuming passion for accuracy. A slip passed over in the stress of 'making-up' would occasion him positive distress. But the strain of the work was generally pleasantly mitigated by his lively and humorous sallies. He was an incorrigible punster, and could through his whimsicalities keep the ball of conversation rolling to the accompaniment of innocent laughter. He was far from being enthusiastic over the development of modern music. Handel, Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, the hymn-tune writers, and the English Cathedral school had for him much greater fascination. He did not compose for publication, and he often deplored the quality and quantity of the output of musicians less conscious of their limitations than he was of his own.

In the Musical Times he will be best remembered by his educationally suggestive interviews with musical celebrities, and the long series of articles on cathedrals, churches, and educational institutions upon which, over the signature 'Dotted Crotchet,' he bestowed so much care and erudition.

A genial comrade, an exemplar of thoroughness and accuracy, an indefatigable worker with high ideals of duty, less perhaps to himself than to others, his memory will always be cherished by a large circle of co-workers and friends.

No separate photograph of Mr. Edwards being available, we present as a supplement a family group showing Mr. F. G. Edwards on the left, his father in the centre, and his son on the right.

THE CHAMBER MUSIC OF WILLIAM BOYCE.

By H. C. COLLES.

The statement that Handel in the latter years of his life completely overshadowed musical activity in England, is one which is sometimes accepted with too little reserve. Its truth in a certain sense is beyond question. When we think of music in England during the first half of the 18th century, the figure of Handel rises before our eyes and looms so large that no other appears to be of any appreciable importance. If we try to look beyond him our attention is naturally attracted to the various musicians who were set up as rivals to him—Buononcini, who finally decamped and left Handel master of the field; Maurice Greene, whose concert at 'The Devil' tavern called forth Handel's famous jest that 'Toctor Greene had gone to the Devil'; and others who, like Greene, have been finally disposed of by posterity. But though Handel's supremacy is not to be disputed, we are sometimes too ready to assume that the work of men who never attempted to rival him is altogether negligible. Church musicians, who after all have been the strongest and most consistent amongst English musicians, can claim a certain amount of attention for good work done in their branch of the art by Handel's lesser contemporaries, and though a summary verdict might be given against Dr. Greene's concerts, his anthems still survive with honour. The name of Boyce at once suggests the great collection of English Cathedral Music, and further reminds us of one Service and perhaps half a dozen anthems which are to be heard in most of our cathedrals. A well-known professor remarked publicly, when a sonata by Boyce was played at a concert some time ago, 'I have played Boyce in A some thousands of times, and of course we do several of his anthems, but I think I never heard any instrumental music by him,' and this probably represents the attitude of many musicians fairly accurately. When we compare the instrumental and the choral music of Boyce, we feel that circumstances played a large part in the judgment which killed the one and saved the other alive. The sonatas are quite as good in their kind as most of the anthems in theirs. We find the same excellence of workmanship, coupled with some uncertainty as to what constitutes a distinctive musical thought, and indeed a vagueness of perception which sometimes allowed the composer to write when he had no particular musical idea to express. The circumstances which had such decisive effect upon the two branches of work, were that almost immediately after these compositions appeared, instrumental music in other countries blossomed into new forms of beauty which far outstripped the limits of Boyce's work, while the distinctive church forms of anthem and service remained undeveloped for many years after, so that the composers of the period were never directly superseded. But because Boyce's chamber music was thrown into the shade soon after it was written, there is no reason why musicians to-day should not form a just estimate of it. Fortunately we are getting past the elementary stage of criticism when one style of work is complained of because it has not the qualities of a different style, and we may look at the twelve sonatas for two violins and bass which Boyce wrote about the year 1747 and discover what distinctive characteristics they possess.

The most promising fact which strikes one on looking through these sonatas is that they are by no means all on one level. There are movements which are attractive at the outset and hold the interest well throughout, while others are wholly dull and conventional; some attract attention through the initial interest of their ideas and do not maintain it afterwards. This in itself makes them worth consideration, for it shows that Boyce was not a dry-as-dust composer who turned out sonatas of one pattern as easily as he took snuff, and put nothing of himself into his work. On the contrary, no two of the twelve are alike in form. They contain some good fugues, but he did not always fall back upon the fugue for his principal Allegro; gavottes, minuets and giguees fill the place that the minuet constantly fills in the quartets of Haydn, and the slow movements are exceedingly diverse in form and style. The order in which the movements are arranged is entirely free, and in some cases one can trace the desire to give a specially pointed contrast in an exceptional arrangement. In the ninth Sonata (C major), for example, a severe Canone grave sempre piano (A minor), in which the three parts move in strict canon, is followed by a particularly jovial number, whose only title is Spirituoso. Neither Canone nor Spirituoso occurs elsewhere. Though a slow movement followed by a quick one, the traditional method in the overtures of Lully and Handel, is a frequent opening, it is by no means invariable. The second Sonata (F major), one of the most interesting of the set, gives an admirable instance of the contrary method:

Andante vivace.

Here is an excellent theme, full of freshness and vigour, and the first violin begins upon it without a note of preparation. Though the second violin is imitative, there is nothing fugal in the movement or indeed in the whole sonata. The composer shows himself in a genial mood, and gives his ideas to his hearers in a spontaneous fashion, with no display of scholarship. Indeed the mood is so constant here that there is scarcely an attempt at contrast, and only an Adagio of eight bars divides the first movement from the second Allegro, which in turn is immediately followed by a Finale in gigue measure (6-8 time). There is certainly very little of the pedant in these sonatas, for although Dr. Boyce excelled in fugues, and some of these are excellent specimens, he, like the greatest of all fugue writers, did not despise a merry theme for them such as this one from the third Sonata (A major):

No. 2.

Allegro assai.

It is worth notice that this is followed immediately by an Adagio in F sharp minor in which arpeggio passages aim at, and to some extent achieve, a very definite emotional expression.

Boyce's slow movements are perhaps the most enlightening part of his work, for in them one sees him striving for articulate expression which was beyond him. There are of course several Adagios of seven or eight bars which merely link one movement with another, after the rather careless method of Handel. One little movement which stands apart from all others may be quoted in full. It comes from the fourth Sonata (G. minor), and the mere fact that it is in E flat major marks it as an unusual experiment in key relationship, since elsewhere almost the only variation of key between the several movements of one sonata is found in the change from major to minor, or vice-versâ. The eight-bar melody is simple enough, and may sound trite to modern ears, but the expansion of every one of its features in the development which follows is by no means so obvious, and the effort to get fuller expression from the phrases by repeating them over wider intervals shows the composer groping after principles of melodic development which Haydn and Mozart were to realise more fully:

No. 3. Grave.

Vl. 1 & 2.

Cello figured for Harpsichord.

Among these sonatas there are a number of Largo movements, mostly in 3-2 time, which are entirely void of any distinguishing characteristics; but the Andante which begins the seventh Sonata (D minor), though very different in material and design from the Grave which we have quoted as Example 3, illustrates the attempt at wider expression. The number and variety of its rhythmic figures are remarkable, and all are used very freely. Such movements suggest that Boyce was working in the same direction as C. P. E. Bach, that he was feeling after the slow movement which Haydn developed so wonderfully, but that, like C. P. E. Bach, he had neither sufficient of the genuine melodic impulse to create satisfactory subject-matter for a slow movement, nor sufficient technical grasp to make the best use of such material as he possessed. In more lively measures spontaneous tunes sometimes sprang from his pen, as in the charming gavotte which ends the fourth

Sonata, and the country dance which gives so much vitality to the seventh :

We might dwell upon several other numbers which have individual characteristics, especially the vigorous Allegro in D major, which opens the fifth Sonata, in which repeated semiquavers give a touch of something like orchestral effect ; or the syncopated theme of the affettuoso in the eleventh. We wish, however, only to draw attention to the most striking case of thematic development which the set contains. It may be merely a chance, but it is certainly a happy one, that this occurs in the last Sonata, number twelve. The theme is more directly expressive than any of the others. Organists will recall the fact that the initial phrase in another key is used by Mendelssohn in an organ sonata :

After its first statement, Boyce leaves it for the time being to develop the quaver figure, but he returns to it at intervals and always with a special significance. Here is a most beautiful development of it which might have borne the signature of any of the giants who worked in later times :

There is poignant feeling in the way in which the phrase is pressed home and insisted upon, so that in five bars a modulation to the remote key of B minor is effected. That Boyce was wholeheartedly in love with this fragment of melody is shown at the end of the movement, for after the conventional ending he reverts to it and lingers upon its wistful cadence. It is a momentary gleam which shows us the poet.

EBENEZER PROUT.

BORN, MARCH 1, 1835.

DIED, DECEMBER 5, 1909.

The death of Professor Ebenezer Prout on December 5 removed one of England's best known and deeply respected musicians. The story of his interesting career and many notable achievements was narrated with some fulness in the Musical Times for April, 1899. It is therefore not necessary on the present occasion, suggestive of memories as it is, to do more than briefly recapitulate the leading facts of his life. He was born at Oundle, Northamptonshire, on March 1, 1835. In 1851 he matriculated at the London University, and he had not up to that period spent much time upon musical studies. After obtaining, in 1854, a London University B.A. degree, he became assistant master in a school, and afterwards for a short time carried on a school of his own. Then he began to study music seriously, and in 1862 he won a prize of £10 offered by the Society of British Musicians for the best string quartet, and later he was again successful with a pianoforte quintet. He became organist at Dr. Allon's Congregational Chapel, Islington, in 1861, and retained the post until 1873. In 1882 he was appointed Professor of harmony and composition at the Royal College of Music. Later he filled a similar post at the Royal Academy of Music, and in 1884 he also joined the staff of the Guildhall School of music. He was thus closely associated with the three chief educational musical institutions of the Metropolis. In 1871 he edited the Monthly Musical Record, and he became successively musical critic of the Academy and the Athenæum, and also contributed many articles to the Musical Times and to Grove's 'Dictionary of Music.' Notwithstanding the onerous demands of this great pedagogical and critical activity, Ebenezer Prout found time for much composition, including three choral cantatas: 'Hereward,' 'Alfred' and the 'Red Cross Knight.' His editions of 'The Messiah' and 'Samson' are other instances of his activities. His edition of the former work was the fruit of much laborious investigation. Not the least of its recommendations is that it corrects numerous mistakes that crept into former editions. But perhaps he exercised a wider and more permanent influence over his generation by his luminous theoretical works than he did by his music, sound and scholarly as that is. His 'Harmony, its theory and practice,' and the series of manuals on Counterpoint, Canon and Fugue, and Form and Instrumentation, have had great vogue, and have shaped the musical thought of innumerable students. In 1894 he was appointed Professor of Music in the University of Dublin, and this post he retained until his decease. He was an active member of the Incorporated Society of Musicians. In 1904 his portrait, in his Dublin Doctor's robes, was painted by Mr. E. Bent Walker, and was presented to him by numerous friends and pupils. We are very glad to provide our subscribers with a reproduction of this picture. It is considered to be an excellent likeness of the Professor, and will form a fit companion to the portrait presented with our April, 1899, issue.

Prout had a phenomenal musical memory. He was a devout Bach worshipper, and probably knew this incomparable composer's music as well as any man in Europe. His attitude to Wagner's music was on the whole appreciative. To the extreme moderns he was less sympathetic. The present writer went with Prout to the first London performance of 'Heldenleben' (Strauss), and is not likely to forget the accompanying and subsequent expression of the Professor's opinion. Prout was a keen and brilliant controversialist, always able, in musical matters at least, to support his opinion by wise saws and modern instances. Punctuality was one of his virtues, and he planned his work with marvellous exactitude. He would tell you in March all that he meant to accomplish in the next few months, and on what day in July and by what train he would depart for his holiday, and it all came off. He was a rare linguist, a chess player, a great smoker, a raconteur of exceptional interest, somewhat of a Bohemian in dress, a genial and sympathetic friend, and his whole life was an inspiration to his great circle of friends.

The funeral took place in Abney Park Cemetery (London, N.E.) on December 9, in the presence of a large concourse of friends and representatives of the institutions with which he had been connected. The organ was played by Mr. John E. West, a relative and former pupil. There was no singing. The deceased musician's brother, the Rev. Edward Prout, delivered a simple, touching address that searched the hearts and comforted the spirits of all present. It was stated that even during the last week of his painful illness the Professor commenced a new analysis of Bach's '48,' and that he had completed his account of the first four. On Sunday, December 5, he was in his study, about to commence the fifth Fugue, when one of his heart attacks came on. He felt that the great transition had to be made, and said, 'Lord, do not let it be long.' His prayer was mercifully granted.

It need hardly be added that the sympathy of all who knew Professor Prout or profited by his labours, will be respectfully tendered to his sorrowing widow and family.

HOW A TRUMPET IS MADE.

By D. J. BLAICKLEY.

I.—THE NATURAL TRUMPET AND HORN.

In popular language the word 'trumpet' is very commonly used to denote any wind instrument that is sounded by the action of the lungs and lips of the player without the introduction of an artificial reed (the lips must be regarded as a natural double reed). It must be granted that flutes are not included in the widely-embracing term 'trumpet' as generally used, but the lip-action required for these instruments so totally differs from that required for any instrument that by the widest use of the word can be called a trumpet, that no confusion ever arises between these two classes even amongst those most ignorant of musical matters.

Before treating of the trumpet in a specific sense, the word may in the meantime be used in the popular way to signify any metal wind instrument blown by the lips, for all that can be said in this article in regard to the craftsmanship and mechanical processes concerned in the production of the trumpet, using the word in its strict and limited sense, is equally applicable to any brass instrument. The difference between one instrument and another is in the design requisite to give a desired result, just as the design of a naval architect is directed to ensure the efficiency of, and the differentiation between, say, a cargo boat, a passenger liner, and a racing yacht, while the actual methods of construction are the same in each case.

A natural horn, a conch shell, or an elephant's tusk must, at a very early period of human history, have lent itself to the purpose of forming a useful and powerful instrument for purposes of war or the chase simply by the fashioning of an orifice at its small end for the action of the lips. The 'making' of such an instrument would be a very simple matter, but it would soon be found that some were better, that is, more powerful and more easily sounded, than others. The natural tones on any such horn of conical bore approximate more or less closely to the lower notes of the harmonic series, as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, &c., or c, c', g', c'', e'', &c., the lower two or three notes only being practicable on short horns. With a horn of about four feet in length there is, however, no difficulty in obtaining the sixth harmonic, or g'' in the harmonic scale of c, c', g', c'', e'', g'', and as by natural laws capable of scientific explanation the horns of best tone-quality and most easily blown are also those which give this scale most accurately, the ears of man must have been to some extent trained to appreciate the intervals of the octave and the common chord ages before the investigations of Pythagoras in the 6th century B.C. concerning the relationship between the various lengths of a string and the intervals of the octave, fifth, fourth, third, &c.

If instead of a long natural horn a short horn is taken and extended in length by the addition of small cylindrical tubing, a new tone-quality is obtained, of greater brilliancy than that given by the long conical horn; and on such an instrument of the assumed four-feet length the upper notes to c'' , or the eighth harmonic, are easily obtained, but at some sacrifice of the intonation and ease of production of the first and second tones of the series. At whatever time, and in whatever way, may have arisen the distinction between the conical horn and the cylindrical tube with a comparatively short conical expansion or bell-mouth, this distinction has been known through all historic time and is the basis of all modern work in the further differentiation of tone-quality between the various families of brass instruments. In these instruments we have then two main types, viz.:

Trumpets.—With tubing cylindrical for about two-thirds of the total length, and terminating with a conical or bell-mouth expansion. With trumpets must be included trombones, the trumpets being the treble and the trombones the tenor and bass members of the family.

Horns.—Instruments more or less conical throughout, all being less brilliant and piercing than the trumpet, but varying from the delicate quality of the orchestral or French horn to the fulness and breadth of tone of the modern saxhorns and tubas.

Thus the general object in view, in the design of any instrument included in the 'brass wind,' or trumpet and horn classes, is the production of a tube which can be blown by the lips in such manner as to give a wide range or compass of notes in agreement with the natural harmonic series. It is generally known to all students of acoustics that a cylindrical tube open at both ends has this series for its proper tones, and it is equally well known that a tube of half the length closed at one end will give only the unevenly numbered notes of the series; also that these will be of the same pitch as the corresponding notes on the open tube of double the length. As an example, the notes proper to an open tube of about eight and a-half feet in length are here given, and also the uneven notes of the harmonic series which are proper to a tube of half the length. The customary scientific pitch of 256 vibrations for middle C has been assumed:

Notes in Harmonic series	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12
Notes from Open tube	Vibrations—64	128	192	256	320	384	448	512	576	640	704	768
Notes from Closed tube	Vibrations—64		192		320		448		576		704

The series naturally extends indefinitely upwards, but notes relatively higher than those shown are quite exceptional, the actual pitch depending upon the fundamental note or prime tone of the instrument. A tube in the form of a cone complete to its apex has the peculiar and not easily explained property of giving resonance to all the notes of the harmonic series, and of giving them of the same pitch as those from an open tube of the same length. Such a tube, however, cannot be sounded by the lips, therefore some modification of the conical form is necessary in the production of a wind instrument, and the required modifications have been gradually evolved through experience and rule of thumb, supplemented in modern times, since the researches of Helmholtz and other investigators, by definite design in accordance with scientific observations. By modification of form must be understood the various differences of calibration, and not the bending of the instrument into parallel members as in the trumpet and trombone, or the circular form of the French horn. These general outward forms are mainly a matter of custom and of convenience in handling, and have little or nothing to do with pitch or tone-quality. Given a certain pitch, the total or axial length of the instrument will always be the same, whether it is straight, or bent into any particular form. By 'form,' therefore, the general proportions of the tube, wide or narrow, with greater or less conical expansion and bell flanging are implied as essential conditions, and not the general outward appearance or model.

The general dimensions of the tubing suitable for yielding a certain tone-quality, compass, and volume being determined, a further accentuation of distinctiveness in tone-quality is obtained by slight variations in form of the two ends of the instrument, that is, of the mouthpiece and the bell-flange. The extreme types of mouthpieces are those of the trumpet and the French horn. The 'cup' of the trumpet mouthpiece is almost hemispherical, that of the French horn is of a deep conical or funnel shape, and between these two extremes are to be found the mouthpieces of trombones and bugles, and of the modern cornets, saxhorns and tubas. The shallow or hemispherical cup accentuates the brilliancy already obtained by the general dimensions of the trumpet, and the more or less conical cup tends to mellowness of quality: this is heard in the fullest degree in the plaintive tones of the horn.

The extension of the bell-flange has much the same effect as the increase of conical depth in the mouthpiece, that is, the mellowness is thereby enhanced. The crispness of the army field-bugle is largely due to the very slight flanging of its bell, and on the other hand the mellowness of the orchestral or French horn is dependent to some extent on the wide, convoluted-like expansion of its bell. If this were greatly cut down, the tone of the horn would approximate to that of the trumpet.

It may be said, 'Surely the material of which an instrument is made is of at least as much importance as exact proportions?' To this the answer is that the possible influence of the material is commonly very greatly exaggerated. The material must have a smooth surface and also be fairly rigid, so that the force of the vibrations is not absorbed; but granting these conditions are obtained, everything else is merely a matter of convenience of manufacture, cost and durability. For those who can afford silver, silver is a very good material, because it is durable and easily kept clean; but those who can only afford brass or copper may rest assured that a trumpet made of one of these humbler metals is, as a musical instrument, absolutely as good as if it were made of one of the precious metals. I have myself listened attentively to a player (unseen) giving similar passages or calls alternately on a straight bugle made of copper and on another made of brown paper, and found myself quite unable to discriminate between the two instruments. Any slight difference that there may be is more easily felt than described by the player, and is practically inappreciable by the listener. It should be added that in the experiment the interior of the brown-paper bugle was varnished so as to produce a smooth and non-absorbent surface.

For so long a time as short horns of indefinite tone-quality sufficed for the purposes required, the natural horns of animals and the tusks of elephants afforded sufficient and suitable material. But these must in very early days have been supplemented by instruments of metal, as evidenced by ancient frescoes and bas-reliefs. Probably the oldest written record concerning metal instruments is to be found in the words 'Make thee two trumpets of silver; of a whole piece shalt thou make them,' referring to the trumpets for the tabernacle worship, as recorded in the book of Numbers, chap. x., v. 2.

Passing by the various possible ways in which metal may have been treated in the formation of instruments in ancient and mediæval times, we may now describe the way in which a trumpet is made at the present day. The 'making' of anything necessarily begins with its design. This being completed, in the case of the trumpet according to the principles already set forth, the mechanical production is chiefly a matter of sheet-metal work. The bell and so much of the instrument as is conical is cut from the sheet and hammered into a tubular form; the edges being thus brought together are brazed, and the exact required form is then given by burnishing down to a steel mandrel or shape and by turning in a lathe. In the best modern practice the cylindrical portions are made from solid-drawn or seamless tubes, and all the necessary bendings or curvatures are obtained by filling the tubes with lead, so that they may be bent without serious distortion or crippling; after the bending is completed the lead is melted out. The accuracy of the intonation of the finished instrument depends largely upon the skill shown by the workman in bending the various tubes without distorting their calibration. The different parts being thus formed, and smoothed and hardened by hammer-work, they are assembled together by means of ferrules and stays secured by soft or tin-solder, so that the stiffness obtained by the hammering shall not be nullified by the red heat which would be necessary if the final assembling of the parts were the result of brazing or the use of any solder requiring a red heat. The mouthpiece is always a separate part, and is usually made from a casting turned in the lathe to the exact form required. To guard against the possible risk of dirty brass coming into contact with a sore lip, the mouthpiece is generally silver-plated.

Thus far it has been possible to consider only the general lines of the actual development and construction of the trumpet. Its gradual acceptance as an orchestral instrument must be left for a future article.

WHEN HOMER NODS.

BY FREDERICK CORDER.

'Even Homer sometimes nods,' says the Greek proverb; but it is an admission that not everybody can be induced to make. The worthy souls—past and present—who write books on the Great Composers entertain the firm conviction that there are about a dozen musicians, all of a bygone age, entitled to that appellation. These are creatures of a different species altogether from the rest of mankind, and can do no possible wrong—their most blatant 'pot-boiler' is a masterpiece. Per contra the rest of the composing fraternity are hardly worth consideration, especially if they are alive: the length of time they have been dead is, indeed, the measure of their merit. Now, do I exaggerate? Is not this the current view put forth in histories of music and works of musical biography? I never could endure this attitude of blind worship of the few and gross neglect of the many, which is the habit of so many narrow and ignorant minds. It does not lower my opinion of Beethoven one iota that his 'Battle symphony' is quite unworthy of him, and my reverence for Wagner is not diminished when I declare that his 'Philadelphia Fest-Marsch' is an atrocious piece of work. We are all human beings, and when I try to write 'pot-boilers' they come out absolutely worthless: so did those of Mozart. But in writing this paper I was not thinking so much of the failures of great men as of their occasional errors and blunders. These are to me all the more interesting because they are so rare. It is gratifying to reflect that whereas the greatest of painters and draughtsmen frequently commit faults of proportion and perspective, great musicians very seldom fall into technical error. In one of the Raphael cartoons it is said that the twelve apostles have not even the proper number of legs, and in the 'Miraculous draught of fishes' there is certainly a red lobster; but you might search the 636 works of Mozart in vain for a fault due to pure carelessness.

In the recitatives of Handel it is not uncommon to find the last inversion of a dominant seventh followed by something other than its proper resolution, and this, together with the same composer's singular avoidance of the second inversion of the same chord, makes one wonder how he was taught harmony. But I suppose we must make allowance for the period, and not regard these things as actual faults. One could point to many dubious progressions in Bach, such as this, in the 'Chromatic Fantasia':

where the fourth chord does not make sense; but everyone who knows the passage well, will at once get up and declare excitedly that this is the finest thing in the whole work—they always do, when you question a phrase, whether in literature or music. There are occasional 'false relations,' too, in Bach, almost as bad as those of our own Byrd and Tallis, e.g.:

This particular one has always been a marvel to me, coming as it does in the middle of one of the most splendid (No. 5, Book II.) of the 'Forty-eight.'

The extreme simplicity of the harmony in Haydn and Mozart doubtless had its influence in keeping the writing pure, but in Beethoven there is a fair number of slips and oversights, many so trivial as to be unworthy of notice, but a few quite unaccountable. For instance, in the slow movement of the 'Pastoral Symphony':

why could not the flute arpeggio have been made to accommodate itself to the melody, avoiding the suspensions, as it does in all other places? It is of no use saying that Beethoven probably thought it did not matter, when we know how scrupulous he was about details. Again, in the 'Choral Symphony,' we find:

It is evident that either the C natural in the wind or the C sharp in the voices is wrong, but nobody has altered either, so far as I know, to this day. I believe myself that the omission of the third from the voices in the next four bars is also an error, but I am howled at whenever I suggest it. Finding these, and an abnormal number of minor faults in all the editions of this symphony, I took the trouble some twenty-eight years ago to ascertain from Dr. Chrysander that Beethoven, although he received proofs of the work during his last illness, never really saw them. I drew out a list of over eighty small errors and showed them to Sir George Grove, but he declined to entertain the idea that there could be anything wrong in a Beethoven symphony. The matter is rendered all the more puzzling, from the fact that Beethoven has on several occasions intentionally written suspensions—even double suspensions—to be sounded together with their resolutions in the same octave, usually trusting to difference of instrumental timbre to carry off the ugliness.

To his private friends Mendelssohn used to stigmatise Schumann's music as 'unclean,' but as a matter of fact it was almost, if not quite, as immaculate as his own. Schumann's errors of judgment were often serious, but his harmony had only the fault of being perpetually full and complete—it never went astray.

Chopin's complete pianoforte works only afford three or four instances of really bad consecutive fifths or octaves—a remarkable thing, considering the intricacy of his harmony. Occasionally this intricacy led him into obscurities, such as may be found in the middle of the first movement of the B minor Sonata, the same part of the Violoncello sonata, and the well-known bars in the F sharp Impromptu:

The harmony here would appear to be the last inversion of an augmented sixth, but the passing-notes of the melody clash sadly. On the other hand, think what a prodigal wealth of harmonic beauty this man showered upon an uncomprehending world!

In the earliest works of Wagner—"The Fairies" and "Rienzi"—many appalling crudities might be found, but when that great man achieved his full education he moved in his bewildering path with a polished ease and certainty that are the envy and despair of minor musicians. But on the other hand, Berlioz, who, by the scribes, is generally ranked among the gods, has hardly left a work that is not disfigured by grammatical solecisms, not to say barbarisms. Take, for example, the opening melody of his 'Harold in Italy.' It is reproduced from an earlier work, the Overture to 'Rob Roy,' so he must have been proud of it. Was ever a melody worse harmonised in this world? Or take that violin piece which he wrote for Paganini. Its crudity would shame an amateur. Yet this man could do work which is esteemed really great by numbers of good judges. Then there is Strauss—. But no! Say nothing but what is good of the living is my motto. The musical technique of to-day is such a tremendous thing that composers are beginning to despise the fastidious care with which their ancestors resolved their timid discords. Such blemishes as I have here pointed out must have cost their authors many a pang, if they noticed them, but the modern musician will esteem them as beauties. I only say they prove that all composers are fallible human beings.

Occasional Notes.

Sir Edward Elgar, at a recent function held at Aberdeen, gave utterance to some weighty words on the support of music by municipalities. In the course of his remarks he said: 'The future of music in this country is, it seems to me, in a rather—I will not say crucial—but peculiar condition. I do not think that among those persons who are able to pay liberally for music, a love of music has grown very much in the last few years, except in proportion to the increase of population, but among those who are not able to pay for luxuries the love of good choral music and good orchestral music has grown by leaps and bounds. That, of course is a source of the greatest gratification to all who really believe in the value of the highest kind of music, with its soothing, elevating and beneficent influences. If I were able to state that some one had founded a hundred scholarships in one of the large academies, that statement would be greeted with the greatest enthusiasm: I do not know why. Generosity is always applauded, and we do not usually stop to question its wisdom, but if we educate young people to be first-class players—and our English orchestral players are second to none—what is to become of them afterwards? Are all these young people going to teach? Has it ever struck you that we are giving the world, or at least these islands, hundreds of good orchestral players? . . . I would like you to think seriously whether the humanising sphere of music could not be enlarged by municipal aid—by assisting choral societies and orchestras from the rates.'

Speaking of the need of larger concert-rooms Sir Edward went on to say: 'At the recent Newcastle Festival was one of the finest choirs I ever heard, and the people were enthusiastic. They had one of the finest orchestras from London and the best soloists. But they had not a proper room. The Town Hall was not large enough, so with a great deal of ingenuity one of the theatres was converted into a concert hall, but acoustically was not at all satisfactory. Newcastle is a large city, and I am very proud to have been associated with its festival. The results were splendid, except as regards the acoustics. At Düsseldorf on the Rhine there is a magnificent hall, unequalled in London, with all the requirements of cloak-rooms and a restaurant, and the whole thing belongs to the town. The orchestra is also a municipal. Düsseldorf is not a very beautiful town, but many people go to reside there simply on account of the music; the town looks upon that orchestra as a valuable asset, and the municipality takes the responsibility of any loss which may arise. . . . We ought to bring the best music to the people who are least able to pay for it. The choral movement of this country is not only educating choralists, but is doing a very great work which is often overlooked—it is educating listeners. In this way it is a larger factor in the development of music than has ever before existed, and by its influence multitudes hitherto not in touch with music are led to appreciate it and to distinguish the good from the bad. The time is coming when all towns must be able to give the people the good music they want. Under existing circumstances it too often is a matter of very special enterprise to get up a well-equipped performance of a large work. This should not be; larger halls are necessary, and sooner or later municipal aid is bound to be given.'

The preliminary programme of the Leeds Musical Festival is as follows:—Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' a new work by Vaughan Williams for solo voices and chorus, the 'German Requiem' (Brahms), the 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' (Handel), the 'Wellington Ode' (Sir Charles Stanford), 'The Blessed Damozel' (Debussy), and 'The Passion according to St. Matthew' (Bach). The principals will include Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Clara Butt, Madame Ada Crossley, and Messrs. Walter Hyde, William Green, Gervase Elwes, Kennerley Rumford, Plunket Greene, and Robert Radford. Sir Charles Stanford will again conduct.

Opening quite casually the other day a volume of the Musical Standard for 1864, our eye was attracted by the following lines: 'It is an admirable idea, this recital of operatic works, which seems to have originated in the feeling that thousands may participate in the enjoyment of such performances who have neither the opportunity nor, perhaps, the inclination to visit the theatre.' Here we find expression given to the almost universal attitude of our country towards opera. Opera, to the English, has always meant music plus the insignificant adjuncts of words, scenery, and dresses. Pursuing the course of this article we find about a column of close technical criticism (far more technical and earnest than would be tolerated nowadays) upon the opera thus being 'recited,' of which we will quote the principal sentences. The absence of vocal melody is deplored. 'In vain,' says the critic, 'does the ear take hold of some promising phrase, fancying that at last a passage is coming of sufficient continuity to entitle it to be called an air—illusory hope! The clarinet, the oboe, or some one of the strings, the horn—aye, even the drum—will wrest it from the singer, who positively maintains throughout an unequal struggle with a never-tiring and generally triumphant instrumentation. Now, for ourselves, we are not amongst those who set the author down as one upon whom the sun of tune never shines; we recognise a redundancy of exquisite snatches, capable of amplification, in the accompaniments, and only regret that, from some (we must call it) unfortunate predilection, he has not bestowed equal beauties upon the human agent. Now, will any of our readers venture a guess as to the name of the work thus earnestly and soberly criticised? 'Tristan'—'Die Meistersinger'—what? This was Gounod's 'Faust'! In defence of the critic it may be pointed out that an almost identical criticism of Mozart's 'Il Don Giovanni' was given after the first performance of that opera in Vienna in 1788.

The critic of a Sunday paper makes the following strange comment on Mr. F. Corder's article in last month's Musical Times: 'There is such a curious misunderstanding of the logical development of harmony in his otherwise humorous article that the attitude of the academic mind towards modern tendencies becomes immediately revealed.' We are surprised to hear that the horrific version of 'Home, sweet home' is a logical development, if that is what the critic means (what does he mean?), and equally surprised to hear the trainer of all our wildest and most advanced of young composers credited with an 'academic mind.'

The result of the triennial prize competition organized by the Madrigal Society was announced at the meeting of that Society on December 16. Twenty-three compositions had been sent in, and the awards of the judges, Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir George Martin, and Dr. G. F. Huntley, were as follows: The Molineux Prize of £10, with the Society's medal, to Mr. C. E. Miller, F.R.C.O., Highfield, Caversham. The Society's Prize of £5 divided between Dr. Alfred King, Brighton, and Dr. W. E. Thomas, Auckland, New Zealand. The amount was supplemented with a further £5 by Mr. C. T. D. Crews, President of the Society, so that each of the gentlemen named will receive £5.

The Lincoln Triennial Festival will be held on June 8 and 9, 1910. The opening performance will take place on Wednesday evening, June 8, with a miscellaneous concert in the Corn Exchange. On the following day there will be festival services at the cathedral. In the afternoon Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius,' conducted by the composer, and the Symphony (No. 2) in D major of Brahms will be performed, and in the evening Sir Charles Stanford's 'Stabat Mater,' Dr. G. J. Bennett's Easter Hymn, and the 'Hymn of Praise' will be given. The principal vocalists will be Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. Francis Harford. The London Symphony Orchestra will assist, and the choir will consist of the Lincoln Cathedral Choir, with contingents from Lincoln, Grimsby, Hull and Nottingham.

Mr. Landon Ronald has been engaged to conduct an orchestral concert, to be given at Rome on January 6, under the auspices of the Royal Saint Cecilia Academy. The programme is to include Elgar's Symphony in A flat and Edward German's 'Welsh Rhapsody.'

We would again remind our readers of the interesting concert to be given at Queen's Hall, on the 24th inst., in memory of the late Mr. A. J. Jaeger, the programme of which will include Parry's Overture to an Unwritten Tragedy, Elgar's Variations, Coleridge-Taylor's Ballade in A minor, the overture and Hans Sachs's Monologue from the 'Meistersinger,' Brahms's Rhapsody for alto solo and male-voice choir, and songs from 'The Long Journey' Cycle of Walford Davies. Further particulars will be found in the advertisement on page 1.

Mr. Thomas Beecham's season of opera at Covent Garden is announced to commence on February 19 and to continue till March 15. The repertoire promised includes a revival of Sullivan's 'Ivanhoe,' Strauss's 'Elektra' (with the composer as conductor), 'A village Romeo and Juliet,' by Delius, 'The Wreckers' by Ethel Smyth, 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'Hänsel and Gretel,' 'L'Enfant prodigue,' by Debussy, and 'Carmen.' The conductors will be Mr. Thomas Beecham, Mr. Percy Pitt, Herr Bruno Walter and Dr. Richard Strauss. There will be a chorus of eighty, and the Beecham Orchestra will assist.

AN AMERICAN CRITIC ON THE ELGAR SYMPHONY.

An interesting and important communication from 'An American Correspondent,' appeared in a recent issue of The Times. It included the following appreciation of the Elgar Symphony in A flat:

Of the many interesting features of this opening, the one worthiest of comment has been Mr. Damrosch's repetition of Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony, which he introduced here last year and has played in many cities both East and West. This remarkable work, at first obscure and even repellant in some of its features, deepens its impression here with every hearing. It can hardly ever become popular; it makes no attempt at the sensuously pleasing; its themes, with the notable exception of the opening one, are not striking nor easily remembered; the instrumental colouring, rich and varied as it is, remains for the most part sombre, and the expression is mystical rather than passionate or sentimental. But it has something new and something worth while to say; and it says it with such technical skill, such elevation and unity of style, and, above all, with such sincerity, that it cannot but take a high place in symphonic music. The noble, calmly-moving melody with which the first movement opens, establishes at once the mood of the symphony—a mood mystically impassioned, profoundly sad and yet ecstatic—the mood, in short, of religious devotion. It is the expression of a soul brave to meet the struggles of life, and confident of ultimate victory. The Allegro, with its tortuous melodic movement and groping harmonies, seems, as several writers have already suggested, to depict this struggle; not, however, with objective realism, but subjectively, 'sublimating whatever lies within it,' to borrow Wagner's memorable phrase, 'to its quiescence of emotional content, to which alone music can give a voice, and music only.'

Herein Elgar has shown a truly creative independence of current fashions which is likely to breed misunderstanding. So strong is the contemporary bias to realism that the critics are reduced to surprising subtleties of logic in order to explain his work—the writer in the New York Symphony programme book goes so far as to call it 'nothing more nor less than spiritual programme music.' What gives a certain measure of justification to such verbal somersaults is the fact that the work as a whole, and especially the first movement, is full of sudden transitions from theme to theme, which in their lack of purely musical continuity suggest the operation of a poetic scheme in the composer's mind. If, however, we survey the movement in its broad masses these apparent defects of structure largely disappear, and increasing familiarity will no doubt further reduce them.

The Scherzo and the Finale are judged not quite up to the level of the other two sections, the Scherzo because of a lack of melodic salience, the rhythm being the chief source of effect, and the Finale because none of its themes are particularly interesting, and because they are developed with an almost kapellmeisterisch insistence and monotony. They are also, as has been noted, rather unpleasantly reminiscent—the first of the Priests' Chorus in Aida, and the second of the subsidiary subject in the Finale of Brahms's third Symphony. I do not, of course, mean to impute plagiarism, but the resemblance of Elgar's theme to Brahms's, both in the peculiar rhythm of 'three against two,' and in the scoring, suggests one of those unfortunate obsessions, during composition, of a tune not consciously remembered, which sometimes betray the most original composers. Neither these chance resemblances, however, nor the strongly Wagnerian cast of harmony which pervades the Symphony, as it does most modern music to some extent, need blind us to the deep originality of this work. It is original in the precise sense of the word, in that it is not an echo of other men or even of other national styles, but is the personal expression of an Anglo-Saxon of genius. The rarity of such expression in music—in which our race has always for one reason or another been backward—justifies us in hailing it with enthusiasm.

DEATH OF MR. WHEWALL.

CONDUCTOR OF THE NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE CHORAL SOCIETY.

IN our last issue we recorded a noteworthy performance given on November 15 by the North Staffordshire Choral Society, under Mr. James Whewall, at Windsor Castle, before the King and Queen and an illustrious party. On November 18, three days after this interesting event, Mr. Whewall developed appendicitis. A concert, given on November 25 at Hanley for his benefit, was conducted by Dr. McNaught, and it was then believed that Mr. Whewall was recovering. But, after an operation found to be necessary, to the great grief of his family and numerous friends he succumbed. The deceased was fifty-eight years of age.

Mr. Whewall had remarkable gifts as a choir-trainer. He led the Talke Choir, and the North Staffordshire Choir, which grew out of the former organization, to many notable victories at Eisteddfodau and other competitions. But these successes, creditable as they were, did not establish the reputation of the choir and its conductor so firmly as the fine performances they gave in 1903 of 'The dream of Gerontius' (under the direction of Sir Edward Elgar) at Hanley, and later in the same year in London at the Catholic Cathedral at Westminster. The choir also distinguished itself in 1905 by giving a fine performance of 'The Apostles,' again under the direction of the composer. 'Job' (Sir Hubert Parry), 'Elijah,' 'Omar Khayyam,' Parts I. and II. (Granville Bantock), 'By the waters of Babylon' (Havergal Brian), 'The Kingdom' (Elgar), 'Appalachia,' 'Sea-drift' and 'Mass of Life' (Delius), and Berlioz's 'Te Deum,' are amongst other works recently performed by this energetic and enterprising Society.

Mr. Whewall's funeral was made the occasion of a great public demonstration.

In the interests of music in the Potteries, it is greatly to be hoped that the Society will secure a successor as capable and devoted as Mr. Whewall.

Church and Organ Music.

THE ORGANISTS' BENEVOLENT LEAGUE.

AN interesting and important meeting took place in the Music Room of Westminster Abbey on December 4, at the invitation of Sir Frederick Bridge, to consider the possibility of organizing an Association for the relief of organists whom misfortune may have overtaken. This admirable idea was originated by Sir Frederick, whose practical outlook on musical life has benefited organists before now. Among those present were Dr. A. P. Alderson, Dr. J. C. Bridge, Dr. Percy Buck, Dr. Alan Gray, Dr. H. A. Harding, Dr. E. F. Horner, Dr. G. F. Huntley, Dr. Percy Rideout, Dr. T. Lea Southgate, Dr. Davan Wetton, Messrs. T. J. Crawford, A. E. Davies, G. E. Dunn, J. T. Field, W. H. Graham, H. Hodge, T. J. C. Keynes, E. Burritt Lane, W. Lemare, H. E. Madle, C. H. Merrill, F. G. M. Ogbourne, R. M. Roberts, S. Scott, Thomas Shindler, R. R. Terry, H. Weatherly, and Wharton Wells. Letters regretting inability to be present were received from Dr. Walford Davies, Dr. W. G. Alcock, Dr. A. J. Greenish, Dr. C. H. Lloyd, Dr. C. W. Pearce, Dr. F. J. Read, Dr. H. W. Richards, Dr. Hamilton Robinson, and many others.

Sir Frederick Bridge presided, and explained his ideas regarding the scheme. He particularly wished to point out that it was not a mutual benefit league, and that it was not to be limited to members of the Royal College of Organists. Also, there would be no subscription. His suggestion was for a number of active organists to undertake to give at least one recital, lecture, or concert each year, and hand the proceeds, after payment of expenses, to the committee. He thought that out of the 20,000 organists in the kingdom, 200 (to take an absurdly small proportion) might be found who would be able, by their efforts in the aforementioned direction, to realise, say, a couple of pounds each on their annual performance, and that the amount, some £400, would be sufficiently large to engage the attention of the committee. Over 100 promises had already been received, and Dr. Alan Gray had already given a recital and forwarded the proceeds. Messrs. Norman & Beard had also promised three guineas.

Resolutions were then submitted to the meeting by the chairman. The first was:—'That an association be formed, entitled the Organists' Benevolent League, having for its object the relief of deserving organists who are in distress, or of those dependent on them.' This was seconded by Dr. Huntley and carried unanimously. The second resolution was:—'That the League be a voluntary association, there being no regular subscription, and no pecuniary responsibility incurred by those who support its objects.'

This was also carried unanimously, having been proposed by Dr. Alan Gray and seconded by Dr. Davan Wetton. The third resolution, 'That it be understood that the basis on which the League rests is an appeal to organists in the United Kingdom to contribute once a year, if possible, to its funds, by giving an organ recital, concert, lecture, or appropriate entertainment, the proceeds of which, after expenses have been deducted, shall be transmitted to the committee of the League,' was proposed by Dr. Buck, seconded by Dr. Harding, and carried unanimously. The fourth resolution dealt with the composition of the Governing Committee. It was proposed by Dr. J. C. Bridge and seconded by Mr. Wharton Wells that it should consist of the organists of St. Paul's Cathedral and of Westminster Abbey; of the Chapel Royal, St. James's; of St. George's, Windsor; of St. Saviour's, Southwark; of the Westminster Roman Catholic Cathedral; of Canterbury Cathedral and York Minster; of a representative organist of a notable London church; of one municipal organist; of three or more organists of Nonconformist bodies; of the President, Hon. Secretary, and Registrar of the Royal College of Organists; of the President and Hon. Secretary of the Union of Graduates in Music; of the Master of the Musicians' Company; and of the Treasurer of the Royal Society of Musicians, with power to add to their number. Having been discussed, this also was carried unanimously.

It was then proposed by Mr. J. T. Field, seconded by Dr. Alderson, and carried nem. con., that Sir Frederick Bridge be requested to accept the office of president, and that Mr. Thomas Shindler, Registrar of the R.C.O., continue to act as secretary.

Lastly, it was proposed by Mr. E. Burritt Lane, seconded by Dr. Horner, and carried unanimously, that, besides the contributions sent by organists and others, as the result of special performances, the League should gladly accept personal donations from all willing to assist in the scheme.

The chairman then mentioned a few suggestions which he wished to place before the Governing Committee, such as the application to the R.C.O. for the use of their premises for the offices of the League, and the issue of a circular, embodying the details of the scheme, to organists generally.

The question was raised as to the desirability of including as eligible for relief amateur organists in other employments, and those connected with undesirable institutions, but Sir Frederick Bridge pointed out that the League should be without class or cliquism; that the word 'deserving' in the first resolution protected them if necessary, and that each case would be considered on its merits by the Governing Committee.

After some further discussion, to which Dr. Harding, Dr. Southgate and others contributed, the meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to Sir Frederick Bridge, proposed by Dr. Alderson and seconded by Dr. Harding.

We need hardly add that this excellent scheme has our most cordial wishes for its success, and that these will undoubtedly be shared by all who appreciate the organist and his work.

ADVENT SERVICES.

SPÖHR'S 'LAST JUDGMENT.'

The solemnity of Advent was again impressed upon a large congregation at St. Paul's Cathedral on December 7, when a deeply convincing rendering of the above work was secured by Sir George Martin, who conducted. The service was preceded by his setting of the 'De profundis.' Mr. Charles Macpherson was at the organ, and there was a full orchestra.

A performance was also given at St. Mary Abbots, Kensington, on Sunday, December 12, and the solemn traditions of the work were worthily upheld by the fine choir of the church. The solos were undertaken by Master Edwards and Messrs. Ginger, Pearce, Toy, Burgess and Lewis. Messrs. Pardon, Jeffreys and Frame assisted in the quartets. Mr. Henry R. Bird was at the organ, which was supplemented by drums played by Mr. Goodwin. Mr. W. G. Ross proved an efficient conductor. It is much to be regretted that the lack of financial support by the congregation should lead to the discontinuance of the orchestral services which have been such a feature of the church.

Other performances of Spöhr's 'Last Judgment' were as follows:

St. Stephen's Church, St. Albans, on December 12, conductor, Mr. George F. Wood.
St. Saviour's Church, Denmark Park, on December 15, conductor, Mr. James W. Smith.
Cirencester Parish Church, on December 13.
Holy Trinity Church, Stroud Green, on December 12, conductor, Mr. H. J. Timothy.
St. Mary's Cathedral, Glasgow, on December 17, conductor, Mr. G. T. Pattman.
Boston Parish Church, on December 10, conductor, Mr. G. H. Gregory.
St. John's Church, Upper St. Leonard's, conductor, Mr. Leonard O'Connor.

BRAHMS'S 'REQUIEM.'

The above work was given at Leeds Parish Church on December 3, under Dr. Bairstow's direction; on December 8 at Ripon Cathedral, under the conductorship of Mr. C. H. Moody, and at St. John's Church, Upper St. Leonard's, on December 8, under Mr. Leonard O'Connor's direction.

At Brixton Church, on Sunday, December 5, an excellent performance of Elgar's 'Light of Life' was given under the conductorship of Mr. Douglas Redman. There was a full orchestra, and the choral portions were sustained by the Brixton Oratorio Choir, numbering 120 voices. The soloists were Misses Ida Kahn and Alice Stroud, and Messrs. John Bardsley and T. Howell. Mr. F. Weist-Hill was principal first violin, and Mr. Welton Hickin rendered excellent service as organist. An address was given by the vicar, the Rev. A. J. Waldron.

On Thursday, December 16, at St. John's Church, Ryde, Isle of Wight, Haydn's 'Creation' was sung by the Oratorio Choir. The soloists were Mrs. G. W. Fellows and Messrs. William Burt and Wallace Wheeler. Mr. W. Brennan Smith presided at the organ.

THE NEW ORGAN AT QUEEN ALEXANDRA MILITARY HOSPITAL, MILLBANK.

In memory of the late Major-General Sir Henry Trotter, G.C.V.O., Grenadier Guards, who died in 1905, his widow, the Hon. Lady Trotter, has presented an organ for the chapel, which, on December 15, was formally dedicated with a short service, conducted by the Rev. Dr. Hackett and the Rev. R. L. White, Chaplains to the Forces. An organ recital was afterwards given by Dr. W. G. Alcock, who succeeded in interesting a crowded congregation, although the resources of the instrument were necessarily limited. The organ, built by the Positive Organ Company, consists of one manual and four speaking stops, an octave-coupler, and the very ingenious melodic arrangement by which, at will, the top note of any chord acts upon a stop of more pronounced tone. This principle is also applied to the lowest note, when the 16-ft. bass is supplied. There are no pedals. The following was the programme, which effectively demonstrated the capabilities of the organ:

|-------------------------------|-------------------|
| 1. March on a theme by Handel | Guilmant. |
| 2. Andantino | Chauvet. |
| 3. Berceuse | Saint-Saëns. |

Reviews.

Sonata in F major for violoncello and pianoforte. Four characteristic pieces for viola and pianoforte. By W. Y. Hurlstone.

[Avison Edition: Novello.]

To procure the publication of works by Hurlstone is to do justice, not only to the composer's genius, but to British music. It would be hard to name a finer collection of chamber music by a British composer than the series of works given to the world by Hurlstone during his short life. They are gaining, in this country, a steadily increasing reputation and popularity to which a vogue upon the Continent would be a natural corollary. The Sonata in F for violoncello and pianoforte is a typical example of his style. The thematic material is elusive, but has a strong character of its own and is full of suggestion. The beauty of the work lies, however, in treatment and form. The first movement, for instance, is a model of artistic development and compactness. With the exception of the second movement, which is entitled 'Ballade,' the preponderating mood of the whole is one of geniality. Moreover, the music for both instruments is laid out with a view to avoiding the sombre hue so often associated with violoncello works.

The four pieces for viola and pianoforte are entitled 'Ballade,' 'Croon song,' 'Intermezzo,' and 'Scherzo.' Here again the genial atmosphere predominates, but, as in the Sonata, there is neither triviality nor irresponsibility. Form is never lost to view, and the methods of expanding the themes are those of 'symphonic development' in its most artistic sense. In both of the works under review the outcome of these methods is perfect naturalness. There is none of the parading of device, at which detractors of the academic style fling their scorn. There is no diffuseness and no 'padding.' The violoncello work is also issued arranged for the bassoon, and the viola pieces arranged for clarinet.

The organ and its masters. By Henry C. Lahee.

[Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons, Ltd.]

Mr. Lahee is well known by his works on 'Famous singers,' 'Grand opera in America,' &c., and the book now before us should prove valuable to any who desire a detailed knowledge of the lives of those who have devoted themselves to the development of organ-playing. The pages teem with information regarding the attitude shown towards the instrument by musicians of many countries, and though more interesting historically than technically, the development of the organ and its progress to its present capabilities through many and various schools of thought and treatment are well described. Much space is necessarily devoted to the ecclesiastical influence under which the instrument for so many centuries has fostered.

We may venture to hope that the list of foreign 'masters of the organ' is more complete than that relating to this country. There are some misprints which it would be well to rectify in the next edition, e.g., Morley's Christian name was Thomas, not John. Wigan is in Lancashire, not Yorkshire. On p. 231, Sir John Stainer is stated to have been appointed to St. Paul's in 1873. It should be 1872, and is so given elsewhere in the book. One hardly requires warning against confusing Fox's theoretical 'Gradus ad Parnassum' with that of Clementi, which consists of pianoforte studies, produced nearly one hundred years later. A quotation from an article on organ-building, by Dr. C. Maclean, forms an invaluable addition to the work, which will no doubt be widely read with interest and advantage.

The Office of the Holy Communion. Set to music in the keys of C and E. By Alfred J. Eyre.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This contribution to the collection of 'Short settings of the Office for the Holy Communion,' edited by Sir George Martin, seems to us most successfully to fulfil the requirements rightly held to be necessary, which are: 'they should be modern, interesting and devotional, and at the same time easy of execution.'

The Kyrie avoids monotony by its three settings, besides that after the tenth commandment. The Credo has a bold and effective opening, and unisonal passages are not too numerous, while the organ part is often independent and always interesting. We could have wished the composer had not fallen into the too frequent error of accenting the words 'God,' 'Light' and 'Very' in place of the word 'of.' The phrase 'The Lord, and Giver of Life' is, however, rightly constructed. In the Sanctus the alternating organ and vocal phrases should be effective, and the passage leading to A major logically introduces that key.

The Benedictus is set out on familiar lines, while the Agnus Dei is treated with greater originality. We expect the second line of the Gloria in Excelsis will mean extra rehearsal, if it is really to be unaccompanied. The music sustains its interest and straightforward character to the end, and the setting is certain to be widely used.

Memorandum on the pitch of Army Bands. By D. J. Blaikley.

[Boosey & Co.]

This exceedingly interesting and valuable little pamphlet has been circulated by order of the Army Council to Army Bands. The object of the author is to give concise information as to some of the conditions which affect the pitch of wind instruments, causing them to vary from an accepted or authorized standard. The influence of temperature is clearly and fully traced, and methods of obviating the difficulties that thus arise are described. The latest regulation standard pitch (which is known as 'Kneller Hall pitch') is 479.3 vibrations at 60° Fahrenheit for B flat, corresponding with 452.4 for A and 538 for C at the same temperature. The pamphlet concludes with some useful general hints on the care of brass and wood instruments.

MUSIC FOR VIOLIN AND PIANOFORTE.

Arioso. Gavotte and Musette. Composed by J. D. Davis.
Chanson de Mai. Chanson d'Octobre. Composed by Alfred Pratt.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

In his 'Arioso' Mr. J. D. Davis adopts the phraseology of an early period, and slightly extends its scope in order to express ideas of a more modern type. The piece has much of the continuity and flowing part-writing of a slow movement written in the early 18th century. To show, however, that he is not slavish imitator, Mr. Davis introduces a sudden modulation which would astound the worthies of that period. The 'Gavotte' bears out its title in vigorous manner, to which the dainty 'Musette,' employed as a Trio to the 'Gavotte,' affords a complete and charming contrast. Like the 'Arioso,' it is an attractive piece, of no great difficulty, and containing not a single bar of commonplace music.

In his two 'Chansons' Mr. Pratt shows the ability to think along original lines without recourse to any out-of-the-way devices. His melodies belong to an intelligible idiom, and his harmonies are interesting without being Debussian or Straussian. Both compositions are written, without elaboration, in the best form of the 'drawing-room piece.'

Darke (scholar); the Leo Stern Memorial Gift for a violoncellist (£5 5s.) to Maurice Soester; the Lesley Alexander Gift (£15 15s.) to Ellen M. Bartlett (violinello scholar). A competition for the Norfolk and Norwich Scholarship took place, and it was awarded to James Pond, of Lakenham (violinello), Miss Irene Page (organ) being highly commended and named as proxime.

Obituary.

The death of MRS. HENRY J. WOOD has caused widespread grief and sympathy for her stricken husband. Mrs. Wood went into a nursing home, about a week before her decease, in order to undergo an operation that was not deemed serious. But she sank day by day, and died on December 20. She was the only daughter of the late Russian Princess Sofie Ourousuff of Padolia, and was born at Odessa. She became a pupil of Mr. Henry J. Wood in 1895, and in 1898 she was married to the distinguished conductor. As a singer, her style was characterized by purity of vocalisation and breadth of interpretation. Her repertory was an extensive one, and included music in several languages. Her English was perfectly pure both in speech and song, and indistinguishable from that of a native. She brought a keen artistic conscience to bear on all her musical work, and her accomplishments as a musician were great. To all these musical qualities, the late artist added the charm of a winsome manner, simplicity and sincerity. The solace for the loss sustained is the fragrance of this memory.

We regret to record the following Deaths:

On December 8, at Leipsic, Frau ELSE BECKER, wife of Professor Hans Becker, the well-known violin master of the Conservatoire. Frau Becker will be greatly missed by the large colony of English and American music students, to whom she always extended the most charming hospitality.

Mr. GEORGE EDWARD CASE, on November 29, at Polesworth Vicarage, the residence of his brother-in-law, Canon J. G. Trotter, at the age of fifty-five. Mr. Case was for many years a Professor at the Royal College of Music, his speciality being the trombone, on which he was an expert player. At the time of his death he was engaged in writing a history of the instrument, which he had almost completed after many years of research.

'FALLEN FAIRIES.'

NEW GILBERT-GERMAN OPERA.

This eagerly expected opera was produced at the Savoy Theatre on December 17. The idea of the libretto is based upon an earlier drama, 'The wicked world.' It is in two acts, but there is one scene throughout. The fairies live in a cloud, and are at first very happy and incredibly innocent. It appears that every one of them has a human counterpart on earth, which at the fairies' command can be summoned to cloudland. When some of the male sex are thus transported, the fairies learn what love and its frequent attendant, jealousy, mean. Although much is said in praise of mortal love, in the end the counterparts are all dismissed to earth and the fairies resume the jejune monotony of their former existence. Notwithstanding the piquancy, wit, and occasional sincere emotionalism of many of the lyrics, the play as such drags rather wearisomely. Mr. Edward German's dainty, melodious, and lucid music provides the main interest, and this result is achieved in spite of the restriction of the choruses to female voices, and Sir William Gilbert's barring of tenor solos. The few male singing characters are therefore all bass or baritone. The cast of the chief characters is as follows:

Ethias	-	-	-	-	-	Mr. Claude Flemming.
Phyllon	-	-	-	-	-	Mr. Leo Sheffield.
Lutin	-	-	-	-	-	Mr. C. Herbert Workman.
Selene (The Fairy Queen)	-	-	-	-	-	Miss Nancy McIntosh.
Darine	-	-	-	-	-	Miss Madie Hope.
Zayda	-	-	-	-	-	Miss Jessie Rose.
Lochrine	-	-	-	-	-	Miss Ethel Morrison.

Miss McIntosh displays great vocal and dramatic power, and all the other artists named are successful. Mr. Workman, as may be expected, makes the most of the humour in his part. The dances, and the music with which they are associated, are very welcome. The mounting of the piece is on the usual Savoy scale, and the orchestra is efficient and never overpowering. Mr. German conducted the premier performance, and is now succeeded by Mr. Hamish McCunn.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

At the second concert of the season, which took place at the Albert Hall on December 2, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was performed to the satisfaction of a large audience. The singers understood the nature of their task and gave a bright and straightforward interpretation of the melodious and gratefully-written choruses. In the more dramatic sections impressive effects were secured by virtue of the numerical strength of the choir. The solo portions were capably executed by Madame Mary Conly, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Dalton Baker. Sir Frederick Bridge and Mr. H. L. Balfour ably carried out the duties of conductor and organist.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

At their last concert before the New Year, on December 1, the London Choral Society departed somewhat from their guiding principle of producing only new works, by performing Handel's 'Messiah.' Distinction was, however, lent to the occasion by the employment of the admirable edition of the work made with so much care and minuteness by the late Professor Ebenezer Prout, and by omitting several of the well-known numbers in order to make room for those less frequently heard. The experiment proved successful, inasmuch as it attracted a large audience who listened with interest to the unfamiliar numbers. The occasion was made memorable by the appearance of the veteran Sir Charles Santley to sing the bass music, and the other soloists were Madame Mary Conly, Miss Gwladys Roberts, and Mr. Ben Davies. Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted, and the London Symphony Orchestra assisted, with Mr. C. H. Kempling at the organ.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The two concerts given by the Philharmonic Society on November 25 and December 8 were directed by Herr Bruno Walter, the Viennese conductor, who made his first appearance in England last summer under the auspices of the Society. The programmes enabled him to express the breadth of his sympathies. At his first concert he gave sound readings of Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, and of Dr. Richard Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and at the second he presented a thoughtful and appreciative interpretation of the 'Pathetic' Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Madame Alice Verlet (vocalist) and Mr. Harold Bauer (pianist) were the soloists at the November concert, and Miss Kathleen Parlow (violinist) at the December concert. Works by Miss Ethel Smyth were heard at both concerts. At the former, her Overture to 'The Wreckers' made a deep impression. At the latter, her songs 'Chrysis' and 'Anacreontic Ode,' written with orchestral accompaniment, were sung by Mr. Frederic Austin, and were conducted by herself with all success.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Two of the popular Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts have taken place. The programme of November 27 contained the Symphony in C by M. Paul Dukas, which had not before been heard in England, in spite of the fact that it was composed thirteen years ago. The delay in bringing the work to England told against it. Through the various orchestral enterprises, the public has been well posted in all the latest works of Continental origin, and as a result much of the work of M. Dukas sounded out of date. The material as represented by the principal themes is excellent; the workmanship is, however, not in the style of the present. The Symphony flows along smoothly enough, but the phraseology is that of yesterday, and lacks the authority that would invest it with vitality in spite of its being obsolete. M. Dukas's talents are very much better indicated in his Scherzo 'L'Apprenti Sorcier,' heard in the same programme. Madame Clara Butt was the vocalist.

At the second concert, on December 11, Herr Moriz Rosenthal made his reappearance, and brought with him the G minor Pianoforte concerto of Saint-Saëns, playing with all the delicacy of touch and facility of execution which constitute strong features in his work. The Symphony was that of Borodine, No. 2 in B minor, which has not been performed of late. It has the great recommendation of possessing strong national characteristics in its themes, but beyond this the grasp is not sufficiently firm to invest the work with enduring qualities. Both concerts were conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood in his customary illustrative manner.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nothing but what is familiar was played at the concert given under Dr. Richter's direction on December 6. The work of most recent composition was Mr. Granville Bantock's 'The Pierrot of the minute,' which, in addition to receiving frequent performance in England, is making the tour of the concert halls of Europe. The work of chief dimensions was Brahms's third Symphony, to which Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony offered a contrast. Two overtures, 'Die Meistersinger' and Elgar's 'In the South,' completed the programme.

At the concert given under Dr. Richter's guidance on December 13, M. Paderewski's Symphony was repeated. Although public interest in the work was evidently not exhausted at its first hearing, there was some reserve noticeable in its reception on the second occasion. Much more enthusiasm was roused by M. Paderewski's pianoforte playing. He interpreted, in a manner that need not be described, Saint-Saëns's C minor Concerto, and afterwards added three short pieces as encores. The remainder of the programme consisted of Weber's 'Ruler of the Spirits' overture, and a Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt.

The concerts given by this orchestra at the Covent Garden Opera House on Sunday evenings continue their popularity. On December 12, when Dr. Richter conducted, Mr. Ernest Schelling repeated the performance of his 'Suite fantastique' for pianoforte and orchestra that was recorded last month. The Symphony was Beethoven's seventh. Miss Edith Clegg and Mr. Cynlais Gibbs were the vocalists.

For December 26 a performance of 'The dream of Gerontius' is announced to be given, under the direction of Mr. Fagge, whose London Choral Society is to supply the choruses.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A new work and a new singer were brought forward at the concert given by the New Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall on December 2. The new work was provided by Mr. J. D. Davis, who, in a symphonic poem under the title 'The Maid of Astolat,' has portrayed with considerable skill the main features of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King.' The orchestra is well handled, and the subject-matter is refreshingly melodious, while the composition is generally attractive. The new vocalist was Miss Viola Tree, daughter of Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, who made her first appearance on the concert platform. She has a promising soprano voice and considerable temperament; both will improve with experience. Sir Charles Stanford's 'G. F. Watts' Symphony, produced in 1906, was revived, and proved to be well worthy of the attention bestowed upon it by Mr. Landon Ronald, who, as usual, conducted ably.

A NEW ENGLISH OPERA.

A new opera by Mr. Nicholas Gatty, entitled 'Duke or Devil,' was produced by the Moody-Manners Company at Manchester, on December 16. Mr. Gatty is not unknown as an operatic composer; his 'Greysteel,' heard some three years ago, created a very favourable impression of his abilities. The present work fully confirms that impression, and more. It is only a short piece in one act, but it indicates an unquestionable gift for writing for the stage. The book, devised by Mr. Ivor Gatty, tells the story of a Duke who returns to his native village after long absence. His reception is distinctly inhospitable, for, the rumour having been circulated among the superstitious people that the devil is on earth, the strange Duke is promptly taken for him.

On the instigation of the village blacksmith he is bound and gagged. The blacksmith's daughter is the only one who has a good word to say for the supposed devil, and, for her trouble, she is threatened with punishment as a witch. The arrival of a member of the Duke's household puts matters straight and brings about a change in the attitude of the misguided villagers. The Duke loses no time in departing from the place, and quits it after having made acknowledgment of the perceptiveness of the blacksmith's daughter.

Mr. Gatty's musical treatment of this slight story shows great power. The amount of resource he has at his command is exceptional. His point of view is fresh, his ideas original, and his orchestral expression of them masterly. Though it is but a short work and much, too much, in fact, is crowded into a small space, the mind behind it all is of no common kind. It reveals an unusual gift of description. The touch is always sure, and the human element is not wanting. Gatty is the Elgar of the British serious music-drama, and with increased opportunities, carrying with them increased experience of the point to which emphasis should go to be effective, he will be able to produce works that will make a reputation. The opera is not easy of performance, but everyone concerned did their best. There can be nothing but praise for the efforts of Miss Raymonde Amy, Mr. Seth Hughes, Mr. Magrath and Mr. Charles Moorhouse, who took the chief parts, and for Mr. Richard Eckhold, who conducted; while Mr. Manners may congratulate himself on having introduced to the world one of the most gifted of native operatic composers.

THE PATRON'S FUND CONCERT.

Six works were submitted to public approval at the chamber concert of the Royal College of Music Patron's Fund, given at Bechstein Hall on December 13. The general level was not high in point of originality, and served to bring into greater prominence the two works which alone seemed to justify their production. These were composed by Mr. Ernest Austin and Mr. E. Douglas Tayler respectively. Mr. Austin's work, written in 1902, is a sextet for pianoforte, two violins, violoncello, clarinet and horn, entitled a 'Music Poem.' Considerable originality of thought is shown, and a decided sense of colour appropriate to the instruments employed. Mr. Douglas Tayler's work is a 'Phantasie' trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, which derives its interest from the directness of its style and the legitimacy of its expression. Songs were provided by Mr. Felix White, whose work is ingenious but unvocal; Mr. G. Molyneux Palmer, whose 'Sutherland' song-cycle reveals individuality and a command of vocal expression, although the length of the verses put something of a strain upon his resources but could not disguise his ability; and Mr. York Bowen, whose vocal writings have many pleasing passages, but leave no doubt that his favourite composer at the moment is M. Claude Debussy. A String quartet by Mr. Percy E. Fletcher has the great recommendation of being tuneful, but it is somewhat lacking in individuality. Mr. Ioan Lloyd-Powell appeared as a performer, and played some pianoforte pieces with distinction. The executants included the English String Quartet, and Miss Marie Wadia, Messrs. Spencer Thomas and Jamieson Dodds as vocalists. The first and last put forward efforts of much promise. The performance of Mr. Ernest Austin's Sextet left a good deal to be desired.

WORSHIPFUL COMPANY OF MUSICIANS.

MILITARY MUSIC COMPETITIONS.

The invitation extended by the Worshipful Company of Musicians to those who wished to hear the compositions for military bands, to which the Company has awarded prizes, was readily accepted on December 6, when a numerous audience listened to the excellent performance given by the band of the Grenadier Guards at Stationers' Hall. All the five pieces to which prizes have been awarded were heard in the course of the evening. The first prize of fifty guineas was given to Mr. Percy E. Fletcher for a Suite entitled 'Rustic Scenes.' It has a characteristic old-world flavour, and is scored effectively. The same gentleman was awarded the third prize of fifteen guineas for a March entitled 'The Spirit of Pageantry,' in which there is plenty of tune and vigour, if not striking originality. Singularly apt handling of the material was shown by Mr. F. Cunningham Woods in his Suite, awarded the fourth prize of ten guineas, and its worth is all the greater since it is Mr. Woods' first essay in writing for military band. Mr. Walter Wesché, who also worked in the medium for the first time, showed an unusual command of the material at disposal, and in his Overture 'A Lost Cause,' which was given second prize of twenty guineas, gave every sign of possessing considerable ability in dealing with this comparatively new colour scheme. The fifth prize went to Mr. A. von Ahn Carse for a Triumphal March that fulfilled all rhythmic requirements. The pieces were performed under the direction of Lieutenant Dr. Albert Williams, whose excellent overture 'Heinrich von Meissen' opened the programme. Vocal numbers were given by Miss Ethel Wylie and Mr. J. Horncastle.

The prizes were handed to the winners by the Worshipful Master (Dr. T. L. Southgate) in the course of the evening, and a humorous but sympathetic speech by Sir Frederick Bridge came at the end of the proceedings. The competition has undoubtedly achieved a useful end in encouraging native composers to take up the unduly neglected subject of military band music.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The members of the London Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians devoted the evening of December 11 to a special programme of music by native composers, given at Queen's (Small) Hall. Two entirely new works were heard. One was a String Quartet in C minor, composed by Mr. J. B. McEwen, with the customary wealth of device that has always distinguished his work, and with a full grasp of his material only lessened by a tendency to relapse into the least desirable characteristic of Continental music of the new school. The other novelty was a Suite for pianoforte written and played by Mr. York Bowen. The third movement proved the most individual; the remainder flatters M. Debussy somewhat indiscreetly. Songs by Lewis Carey and Mr. J. F. Barnett were sung by Miss Lucie Johnstone. Mrs. Tobias Matthey gave recitations to Mr. Stanley Hawley's music, and Miss Grainger Kerr sang a group of songs by members of the younger British school.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

REVIVAL OF 'COLOMBA.'

Sir Alexander Mackenzie's opera 'Colomba' was performed by the students on December 11 in the concert hall, under the direction of Mr. Edgardo Lèvi. This opera was successfully brought out by the Carl Rosa Company at Drury Lane on April 9, 1883, and the fifth and last performance of that season attracted an overwhelming audience. It was afterwards taken on tour by the company and performed in the North of England, Scotland and Ireland, always with success. On the present occasion the work suffered by its being presented on a concert-hall platform and without an orchestra. Miss L. James, in the title-rôle, was excellent, and Mr. Sydney Russell (Orso) did well in the later acts. Miss Ismay (Lydia) also exhibited ability, and Miss M. Horton (Chilina), although she has not much voice, showed dramatic power. The chorus had been admirably trained and their clear enunciation was a special point. The amount of success that attended the performance, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which it laboured, suggests that a slightly compressed version, especially of the first act, would renew the popularity of the work.

On December 13 the Dramatic Class, directed by Mr. Richard Temple, performed Sir W. S. Gilbert's 'The Palace of Truth' and Jerome K. Jerome's 'Barbara.'

The orchestral concert was given at Queen's Hall on December 14, under the direction of Sir Alexander Mackenzie. The works by students performed on this occasion were an Elegy and Waltz Intermezzo from a Miniature suite by Mr. Gilleece Dutton; 'Dance of the hunger of Kna,' from 'Jungle' suite, by Mr. Morton Stephenson, and a nautical overture 'Nelson,' by Mr. S. Hartley Braithwaite. The principal feature of the programme was, however, Purcell's scena 'The Witch of Endor,' with the composer's figured bass transformed by Mr. Frederick Corder into a modern orchestral accompaniment. The process was justified by the character of Purcell's harmonies and the extraordinarily dramatic nature of the vocal writing. Three solo voices, soprano, tenor and bass, were employed, representing the Witch, Saul and Samuel respectively. Another interesting number was the fine scena 'Where sets the sun,' from Sir Alexander Mackenzie's 'Story of Sayid,' sung by Mr. Wilson Thornton. The other soloists were Miss Campbell, Miss Turner, Miss Ismay, Mr. Maiden, Mr. Albert Brown (vocalists), Miss Romang (violinist), Miss Savage and Master Langrish (pianists).

The following awards have been made:—Ross scholarship (female vocalists) to Olive M. Turner (London); Phyllis Neilson-Terry being highly commended, and Lillian G. Richard commended. Hine prize (composition) to Greville V. T. Cooke (Ealing). Sainton-Dolby prize (sopranos) to Margaret Ismay (London); Phoebe Cooke being very highly commended, and Catherine M. Walker highly commended. R.A.M. Club prizes: Sight-singing prize to Bridget E. Shannon (London), Nina Rose being highly commended, and Frank St. Leger commended; sight-playing prize (pianoforte) to Arthur Alexander (Dunedin, N.Z.); Phyllis N. Parker being highly commended and Evelyn Dawkin commended. Rutson Memorial prizes: Tenor prize to Cynlais Gibbs ('Stradgynlais'); bass prize to Cecil Pearson (London); contralto prize to Molly Smyly (Bath); Dorothy Webb and Janie Blake being highly commended. Potter Exhibition (pianoforte) to Frank St. Leger (Madras). Westmorland scholarship (female vocalists) to Lillian G. Richard (Swansea); Mildred Avis, Masie Evans, Hilda Henson, and Beatrice Scott being commended. Broughton Packer (Bath) scholarships: Violin scholarship to Ivan E. S. Hawke (Bristol); Kathleen G. Petts being highly commended, and Elsie E. Spencer commended; violoncello scholarship to Francis A. D. Gauntlett (London); Lorraine Bustard being highly commended.

MR. BANTOCK'S 'THE FIRE-WORSHIPERS.'

The Streatham Hill Choral Society and their able conductor, Mr. E. J. Quance, are different from many suburban choirs, for they are no slaves to fashion. Their policy is to perform new and unfamiliar compositions, and, with justification, they rely upon the quality of their singing to attract audiences among a public usually disposed to favour only established works. For the first concert of their present season their choice fell upon Mr. Granville Bantock's 'The Fire-worshippers,' a dramatic cantata, written in 1892 but published much later, that had never previously been performed. Apart from its interest as a study of the composer's early methods, it has qualities that command attention. Its picturesqueness, both in conception and orchestration, provides a constant attraction to the ear, even if the style has not the strength and individuality of Mr. Bantock's later productions. Here and there the idiom of the music seems to reflect the composer's impressions of 'Tristan and Isolde,' but more often it indicates a creative mind of no common order and an unusual facility. The libretto is adapted from Moore's 'Lalla Rookh,' and deals with the secret attachment of Hinda, daughter of a Moslem Emir, for Hafed, chief of her father's enemies, the fire-worshippers. It is full of dramatic point and ends in tragedy. The chorus occasionally stand for a band of warriors, but more often play the part of narrator. In Mr. Bantock's setting, the character of the music is governed by the situation. Sparing use is made of the leitmotif and 'Eastern colour.' Many pleasing effects are obtained in the solo portions, which are expressive and vocal. The choral work is not difficult according to modern standards.

The Streatham chorists made good use of their opportunities, and proved themselves a well-trained body. The soloists were Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. Frank Mullings and Mr. T. Bryniog Jones.

THE 'WASPS' OF ARISTOPHANES.

DR. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS'S MUSIC.

For the triennial Greek play at Cambridge this year the 'Wasps' of Aristophanes was chosen, and performed with great spirit by members of the University. A feature of the production of this quaint skit on human weakness, with its undercurrent of political satire, was found in the incidental music specially composed by Dr. Vaughan Williams. He has provided a large amount of musical illustration—more, in fact, than is general—but has judiciously adopted the plan of accompanying a play dealing with the people by means of music that belongs to the people. In other words, Dr. Vaughan Williams has made liberal use of folk-music, and with excellent results. He also shows humour and a grasp of the spirit that is expected in the music of the Greek play, and completely won the hearts of a section of his audience by introducing quotations from 'The Merry Widow' and from Debussy. His sound scholarship and ability to weave ornamental device round a simple theme are shown at many points. The music, in spite of certain subtleties not always comprehensible to the uninitiated, was well received, and formed a large factor in the success of the production. The principal actors were Mr. D. H. Robertson (Philocleon), Mr. J. R. M. Butler (Bdelycleon) and Mr. E. J. Eskildsson (Nanthis). Dr. Charles Wood conducted.

BEETHOVEN ON THE STAGE.

The latest representation of Beethoven on the stage was made by Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, who on November 25, at His Majesty's Theatre, produced a translation by Mr. Louis N. Parker of M. René Fauchois's play. The piece has had a successful run in Paris. The most justice to the character of the composer was done in this play by the music that accompanies it. A large selection was made, which included extracts from all the nine Symphonies to accompany their embodiment on the stage as witnesses to Beethoven's immortality. The author of the piece did not altogether succeed in avoiding a coarsening of Beethoven's nature or in preserving one's ideals of the personality of the greatest composer the world has yet seen. The musical scheme that illustrated the play had the double value of being both representative and well performed. Mr. Landon Ronald was called in as musical adviser for the occasion, and directed the first performance. The arranging of the music for orchestra, where necessary, was done by the musical director of the theatre, Mr. Adolph Schmidt. The plan pursued made use of the 'Moonlight' sonata, which provided an effective accompaniment to part of the action, although there may be some who saw vandalism in the arrangement of a pianoforte work for orchestra. The songs 'An die ferne Geliebte' and 'Adelaide' were utilised. The 'Leonora' overture No. 3, was played at the beginning, and after the first act a movement of the C minor Symphony, whose lightning conception was shown on the stage, was performed. An increased orchestra was employed, and all possible care was taken in the performance. The interest in the composer was extended beyond the stage and orchestra by an exhibition, in the vestibule, of some of the Philharmonic Society's relics.

The exhibitions offered annually by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music, which entitle their holders to free tuition at either of these institutions for two or three years, have been awarded to the following candidates:—Constance K. Newell, Watford (violin), Lillian M. Gaskell, Twickenham (pianoforte), and Mary Morgan, Eastbourne (violin), at the Royal Academy; and Margaret A. M. Stoddart, Jersey (violin), Joyce E. Gale, Hammersmith (pianoforte), and Dorothy E. Bostock, Norton, Malton (violin), at the Royal College. The exhibitions previously held by the Misses Phyllis G. Boulton (London), Golda L. Ginsburg (London), and Zona Trader (Queensland, Australia), at the Royal Academy; and by the Misses Elsie M. Avril (London), Olive Glasfield (Gravesend), Mary B. Graham (St. Andrews), M. Anita Murray (Queensland, Australia), and Alice I. Wigmore (Perth, Western Australia), at the Royal College, have been renewed for a further period of one year.

London Concerts.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The bold experiment essayed by the members of the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society of including the second Symphony of Brahms in the programme of their concert of December 10, was fully justified. The performance, given under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, was well-sustained and tuneful, and served to testify to the high state of efficiency to which these amateur players have been brought by their new conductor. Paganini's Violin concerto in D was played by Miss Kathleen Parlow, and the male-vocal choir which forms part of the Society sang effectively under the guidance of Mr. Munro Davison.

The Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, whose playing, under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Payne, continues to approach the highest standards, gave a smoking concert at Queen's Hall on December 15. The orchestral numbers consisted of small works of light character. Miss Clara Butterworth secured a notable success with Elisabeth's Prayer from 'Tannhäuser,' and songs by Mr. Montague Phillips. Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. Harry Dearth and violoncello solos by Miss May Mukle.

The Strolling Players' Orchestral Society gave a concert on December 9, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Ivimey. The programme included a feature of interest in the 'Suite Venitienne' by Mr. W. H. Reed. The soloists were Miss Mary Grey and Miss Clara Evelyn (vocalists) and M. Léon Sametini, who played Wieniawski's D minor Violin concerto.

MR. ERNEST AUSTIN'S COMPOSITIONS.

The very sensible step of giving a concert of his own compositions was taken by Mr. Ernest Austin on November 26, when, at St. James's Hall, he brought forward some thirty of his own works for voice and pianoforte. The majority of them have been published, so that the occasion was frankly a display of marketable wares. There was some of the monotony inevitable to a programme made up of the efforts of one mind, but the variety of thought represented was remarkable. Mr. Austin's compositions both for voice and pianoforte have qualities that should recommend them to the musical public. They are modern in style, but they possess those features, so essential to all music, which establish a common interest between composer and audience. The greater variety was found in the songs. These represent many phases of thought, for they are all expressed in poetic fashion even when, as was the case with several, they are settings of prose. There is a strong appeal in the ballad 'Love's uncertainty,' and a good example of short song is provided by 'Sweet night.' There is something of the character of folk-song in 'At Eventide' and 'The Log-seller's song,' 'The Shepherd's song,' and particularly 'A song to Myra,' possess the tunefulness and the imagination which should cause them to win widespread approval. The exponents of Mr. Austin's efforts were Miss Gleeson-White, Miss Grainger-Kerr, Mr. William Higley and Mr. Frederic Austin for the songs; Mr. Ernest Lees for the attractive tone-sonnets for pianoforte; and Mr. Harold Brooke as an accompanist of uncommon insight and sympathy.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

The excellent series of chamber concerts given by Madame Beatrice Langley and Miss May Mukle in various private houses in London, continue to provide musical fare of unusual interest. The programmes occasionally revive old music of merit, but more often their tone is modern. At the fourth concert of the present series, given on November 30, a Pianoforte trio by Mr. Ernest Austin and a Pianoforte quartet by Chausson received their second performances in London. Mr. Percy Grainger's setting for String quartet of the Irish reels 'Molly on the shore' and 'Temple Hill,' both from the Petri collection, was the feature of the fifth concert, which took place on December 9. On the same occasion M. Gabriel Fauré's beautiful, and happily not unfamiliar, Pianoforte quartet in G minor was performed. The sixth concert took place on December 16, when Mr. T. F. Dunhill's Variations on an original theme for violoncello and pianoforte were performed.

A series of concerts was given on November 23, 26, and 30, by the Flonzaley Quartet, who displayed high proficiency in the performance of familiar works.—On November 29 the Solly String Quartet, whose members are of the gentler sex, brought forward a programme composed of works by Albert Roussel, Maurice Ravel, and Max Reger.

Concerts of chamber music were given by Madame Lily Henkel in conjunction with various performers, at Steinway Hall, on November 23 and December 4, when attention was given in turn to French and Russian music. The French works included an attractive Pianoforte quartet in A minor by Ernest Chausson, and the C minor Quartet by M. Gabriel Fauré, played with complete understanding by the concert-giver and Madame Beatrice Langley (violin), Miss Cecilia Gates (viola), and Miss May Mukle (violoncello). French songs and duets were sung with admirable unanimity and expression by Miss Hilda de Angelis and Miss Groszholz. The Russian programme was headed by a Trio for pianoforte and strings by Gretchaninow, new to England, which possessed features of good workmanship.

The London Chamber Concert Association continue to provide programmes of unfamiliar but deserving works, both new and old, and to perform them admirably. The concerts given on November 24 and December 8 took place in the galleries of the Society of British Artists. At the first, which was devoted entirely to old music, the most interesting feature was a Sonata in A minor for two violins, violoncello and harpsichord, by J. Christian Bach. At the second, three highly interesting compositions were given their first hearing in London. These were a Divertimento by Paul Juon, scored for the unusual combination of two violas and clarinet and written in captivating and unconventional style; a 'Suite im alten Style' for string quartet, by J. Brandts-Buys; and a Quintet (Op. 42) for violin, clarinet, horn, violoncello and pianoforte, by Zdenko Fibich. It is much to be regretted that more support is not given to the work of this Association, as their meetings never fail to uphold a high artistic standard and to maintain a thoroughly interesting character.

At the concert given by the capable Nora Clench Quartet on December 14, Miss Ethel Smyth's clever suite of songs 'Odelette,' 'The Dance,' 'Chryssila' and 'Anacreontic Ode' were sung by Miss Edith Clegg. The accompaniment for string trio, flute, harp and percussion was supplied under the direction of the composer.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

For his recital in the Æolian Hall on November 30, Mr. Percy Grainger chose an interesting programme which contained, besides well-known works by Bach, Brahms and Chopin, some rarely-heard modern compositions by Albeniz (El Puerto and Triana from 'Iberia'), Fauré and Cyril Scott (Handelian Rhapsody). The pianist's vivid style of interpretation and his technical sureness were in evidence throughout. His playing reached the highest level in Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Handel.

Mr. Ernest Schelling, in giving a recital at Queen's Hall on December 2, displayed a beautiful touch and an almost perfect finger technique, by means of which he produced, particularly in his own pianistic and interesting variations, some delightful effects. His style, however, is not quite big enough for Beethoven's last Sonata (Op. 111), his interpretation of which, though technically perfect, was not convincing. The programme also included an extravagant but spirited piece 'Alborada del grazioso,' by Ravel, which showed Mr. Schelling's artistic powers in their most favourable light.

On December 7, M. Sapellnikoff's last recital took place with a programme that consisted chiefly of familiar works. His powers of execution and interpretation were never heard to greater effect, and it was regrettable that they were not exhibited in a wider arena than that provided by the Steinway Hall.—Mr. John Powell, at his recital at St. James's Hall on December 8, played well-known works by Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin and others. He is a very promising young pianist, who combines with a beautiful tone an unusual sense of the poetry of the compositions he interprets. He played several of Schumann's 'Forest Scenes' with just the right intimacy of feeling, and revealed considerable temperament in his interpretation of Liszt's 'Mephisto' walse.

Miss Evelyn Stuart's bright and engaging methods were set forth at Bechstein Hall on December 11, in a programme that presented the feature, unusual at a pianoforte recital, of two novelties by British composers. These were a Prelude from the 'Forest of Ariadne,' by Mr. H. Farjeon, and 'Ocean Sorcery' by H. V. Jervis-Read, both of which illustrated individual methods of profiting by modern examples. The most striking feature of the occasion was, however, the violin playing of Señor Joan de Mañen, who had not previously been heard in England. His performance of Mozart's D major Concerto was in every respect a memorable one.

VIOLIN RECITALS.

M. Mischa Elman, whose appearances this season have been brief, gave a farewell recital at Queen's Hall on December 1, before embarking on another American tour. His programme was notable for the contrasts it provided, and these were represented by the 'Symphonie Espagnole' of Lalo, and sonatas by Bach and Handel, as well as numerous short pieces. The broadening of his style, noted at his previous concert, was maintained, and the versatility of his genius was well indicated.—On December 6, at Steinway Hall, Miss Kristina Frey gave another recital of old violin music. She has clearly devoted herself to the subject as the outcome of a sympathy with it, and although her technical powers are not always equal to all the demands she makes upon them, the spirit of her interpretations of sonatas by Handel, Leclair, and Bach was most appreciative. Songs of the same period were sung by Mr. Robert Chignell, and Miss Rosel Stratton accompanied.—At Bechstein Hall, on December 7, M. Zacharewitsch brought to a hearing a vigorous Sonata for violin and pianoforte, by Miss M. E. Marshall, as well as a composition of his own, of considerable ingenuity, designated 'Moods.' Mr. Vernon Warner and Mr. York Bowen gave their assistance at the pianoforte.

MR. WERTHEIM'S VIOLA RECITAL.

A recital of unusual character was given by Mr. Siegfried L. Wertheim at the Salle Erard on December 14. Mr. Wertheim, who is very well known as the principal viola player of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, carried out a programme of solo and concerted music for his instrument. It included a new Sonata by the Dutch composer Heer Von Bruckten Fock. It proved to be a thoughtful and well-devised work that carried conviction. Miss Marie Novello supplied the pianoforte part and also gave solos. Mr. Wertheim played a number of short pieces, including a new Serenade by Mr. W. K. Hamilton, and Miss Marjorie Tempest sang. The recital was of great value in illustrating the possibilities of the viola as a solo instrument in capable hands.

VOCAL RECITALS.

In making her first appearance in England, at Bechstein Hall on November 25, Madame Ida Reman succeeded in justifying her reputation as a lieder singer of the front rank. Her list of songs covered a wide range, and she showed equal sympathy with the many different types included. The quality of her voice is admirable and her use of it masterly. She gave a second recital on December 16 before a large and enthusiastic audience. On both occasions the programme included examples of the most modern schools of writing.

A promising début was made by Miss May Horton on December 6. Recitals were given by Miss Vere Cochran and Mr. Byndon-Ayres on December 7, and Miss Maggie Teyte on December 9. At the recital given by Mr. Hugo Heinz on December 13, he was assisted by a pupil, Mr. Morgan Kingston, who has only recently abandoned his occupation as a miner. He promises to achieve success as a vocalist, for he is endowed with a tenor voice of remarkable power, and possesses considerable musical ability.

Madame Le Mar, at her recital at Æolian Hall on December 10, departed somewhat from her usual practice of singing modern songs by including several examples of Brahms in her programme. In conjunction with its other features, provided by a selection of the lieder of Max Reger and Hugo Wolf, the recital was perfectly successful in establishing the fact that Madame Le Mar has few equals among the vocalists of the day.

On December 8, Mr. Clifford Higgin's Blackpool Orpheus Glee Society (which is a different organization from the Glee and Madrigal Society) journeyed to the Queen's Hall to take part in the presentation of their conductor's new short oratorio, 'Calvary.' This work was first performed at Blackpool in 1908. Its subject-matter deals with the solemn closing scenes in the life of Christ, His Death and Resurrection. The music displays a melodious gift, but it cannot be said that it rises to the grave importance of its theme. Unless Mr. Higgin can greatly elevate his style, he will do better to turn his gifts to the setting of lighter subjects. The performance, under the composer's direction, was a fair one, the choir exhibiting good tone and attack. The Queen's Hall Orchestra supplied the accompaniments, and the soloists were: Mrs. Henry J. Wood, Miss Sarah Crook, Miss Ettie Rawlinson and Mr. Hamilton Harris. The last-named singer is a baritone new to us; he made a highly favourable impression. The remainder of the programme was made up of part-songs and vocal solos. The audience was a small one.

The Choral and Orchestral Society connected with the People's Palace, Mile-End (recently re-organized and now under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Idle), gave their first performance on Saturday, December 18, when Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was performed. The choral singing was of a high order, many of the numbers being given with real dramatic power, while the orchestra rendered efficient service. The principal soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss May Peters, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Dan Price.

Cowen's 'St. John's Eve' was performed by the choir and orchestra of the City of London College on November 25. The soloists were the Misses Ethel and Mary Williams, Mr. Alexander Tucker, and Mr. Herbert Tracey. The choruses were sung with much spontaneity and attention to expression. The band was led by Miss Maud Swepstone, and the accompanists were Miss Gertrude Smith and Mr. Russell Bonner. Mr. W. G. Rothery conducted.

An interesting lecture on 'Morris and country dancing' was given by Mr. Cecil Sharp at a meeting of the Folk-song Society, held in Queen's (Small) Hall, on December 16. Illustrations of several little-known but picturesque and graceful types of dance were provided by Mr. William Kimber and students of the Chelsea School of Morris Dancing.

Suburban Concerts.

On December 11 the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society performed 'Israel in Egypt,' under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill. The choralsists, inspired by their usual enthusiasm for the music and for their conductor, maintained their own high standard of excellence. The 'Hailstone chorus' and 'The Lord is a Man of war,' the latter sung by the tenors and basses, were encored. The soloists were Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Marion Perrott, Miss Maria Yelland and Mr. Samuel Masters. It was gratifying to find that a large audience was present and that the performance received the appreciation that it deserved.

On November 27 the Crystal Palace Orchestral Society and Crystal Palace Choir gave a thoroughly enjoyable evening's entertainment in the form of a 'Bohemian' concert. The well-selected miscellaneous programme included a feature of interest in Félicien David's Symphonic ode 'The desert,' for soli, male chorus and orchestra. The work is characterized by 'Eastern colour' effects, whose quality must be mercifully judged, as they were practically the first of their kind. The music was attractive and picturesque, both in conception and scoring, and such as to appeal to both singers and players. The soloists were Mr. Harold Wilde (tenor) and Mr. Richard Temple (reciter). Elgar's choral suite 'From the Bavarian Highlands' was performed by the complete mixed-voice choir, whose singing was expressive and good in tone and unity. The orchestra was heard alone in the 'Meistersinger' overture and Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' suite.

Sir Edward Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was performed by the Dulwich Philharmonic Society at the Crystal Palace on December 4, under the able conductorship of Mr. James Brown. The solo vocalists were Miss Maria Yelland, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. John Prout. The work was preceded by the same composer's 'Sursum corda' for strings, brass and organ. The latter instrument was in the hands of Mr. Martin Klickmann. Both choir and orchestra fully maintained their high reputation, and the oratorio again created a profound impression.

The South London Musical Society opened their season in the Surrey Masonic Hall on November 29 with a performance of Hubert Bath's cantata 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' and a selection from Gounod's 'Faust.' These works were efficiently rendered by the well-trained choir, assisted by an excellent orchestra (led by Mr. T. E. Gatehouse), reflecting much credit on the conductor, Mr. L. C. Venables. The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Lund, Miss Lilian Tooley, Mr. Frank Webster and Mr. Herbert Tracey.

The Harringay Glee and Choral Society and Orchestra gave a concert in the Northern Polytechnic on December 1, when the principal feature of the programme was Cowen's 'St. John's Eve.' Mr. Harry E. King, the conductor, is to be congratulated on the excellent results he obtained, both choir and orchestra giving evidence of very careful training. The solo vocalists were Miss Sarah Dawson, Miss Maggie Law, Mr. Stanley Ridout and Mr. Adolf Fowler. Miss Annie Camm was an able accompanist.

A performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' was given at the Public Hall, Manor Place, under the auspices of the Southwark Borough Council, on December 2. The choir—largely recruited from the L.C.C. Evening Continuation Schools—gave a thoroughly intelligent rendering of the choral numbers, and were ably supported by an efficient orchestra. The soloists were Miss Ethel Wood, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. Frederick Banks. Mr. J. Nettleton Taylor conducted. The work was enthusiastically received by a large audience, and inquiries were at once made for a repetition of the cantata. The prices of admission were 1s., 6d., and 3d. The Southwark Borough Council are to be congratulated upon their successful effort to popularise good music.

At the Hither Green Choral and Orchestral Society's concert on December 4, under the direction of Mr. E. Stanley Roper, the principal works performed were Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Cradle of Christ' and Hiller's 'Song of victory,' which were excellently interpreted. The solos were undertaken by Master Leslie Battensby and Mr. Bertram Mills. The other soloists were Mr. Philip Lewis (violin) and Miss Grace Maxted (harp).

The East Finchley and Muswell Hill Musical Society gave a concert on December 9 at East Finchley, when Sullivan's 'Golden legend' was excellently performed under the conductorship of Mr. George R. Ceiley. The choir sang with much intelligence and spirit, and were ably supported by an efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Frank Greenfield, and augmented for the occasion. The solo vocalists were Miss Euneta Truscott, Miss Grace Ivell, Mr. James Davis and Mr. William Burt.

The programme of the Orpheus Choral Society's concert, given at Portman Rooms on December 9, included MacCunn's cantata 'Lord Ullin's daughter,' S. Liddle's cantata for ladies' voices 'The Mermaid,' madrigals by Morley, Byrd and others, and part-songs by Parry and Stanford. Mr. Claud Powell conducted.

The Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society gave the first concert of its third season on December 9, at the Chiswick Town Hall, when Haydn's 'Creation' was performed. The choir and orchestra (led by Mr. H. S. MacDermott), numbering 150 members, were trained by the Society's able conductor, Mr. David M. Davis, who succeeded in obtaining an excellent performance. The solo vocalists were Miss Alice Hare, Mr. Coates Lockhart and Mr. Edward Halland.

The Lewisham Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Frank Idle, opened their season with Elgar's 'Caractacus,' at the Blackheath Concert Hall, on December 9. The chorus sang with intelligence and dramatic insight, and the orchestra (led by Mr. G. H. Wilby) was efficient. The soloists were Madame Anna Shergold, Mr. Gwilym Richards, Mr. Thorpe Bates and Mr. Arthur Rose.

The Bromley Choral Society, conducted by Mr. F. Fertel, gave an excellent performance of the concert version of Gounod's 'Faust' and Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean' at the Drill Hall on December 11. Both choir and orchestra (led by Mr. H. Lewis) did excellent work, and the solo parts were sung by Madame Effie Thomas, Mr. Gwilym Richards and Mr. Montague Borwell.

The Stroud Green Choral Association gave their first concert this season in St. Luke's Hall, on December 13, when MacCunn's 'Wreck of the Hesperus' was the main feature of the programme. Miss Edith Turner and Mr. Wilfred Lawrence were the solo vocalists, and Mr. H. J. Timothy conducted.

The Teddington Philharmonic Society opened their season on December 14, when a very excellent performance was secured of the new concert-selection from Gounod's 'Faust' and Bridge's 'Flag of England,' under the direction of Mr. William Ratcliffe. The solos were admirably sung by Madame Anna Shergold, Mr. Alfred C. Steed and Mr. Stewart Gardner.

The Fulham and District Choral Society gave a concert at the Town Hall on December 15. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was successfully performed under the conductorship of Mr. George Wilby. The solos were artistically rendered by Miss Pitt-Soper, Mr. Kingwell and Mr. Montague Borwell.

The St. George's Choral Society, Tufnell Park, gave a performance of Haydn's 'Creation,' under the conductorship of Mr. W. Henry Thomas, on December 16. The solo vocalists were Miss Florence Holderness, Mr. Braxton Smith and Mr. Montague Borwell.

The West Norwood Choral and Orchestral Society gave a successful performance of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The Death of Minnehaha' on December 16, under the conductorship of Mr. Percy T. Bright. The soloists were Miss Marsden Owen, Mr. Herbert Thompson and Mr. George Baker. The honorary conductor, Mr. Percy T. Bright, was presented at the final rehearsal with a Sheraton bureau bookcase, by a number of past and present members, in appreciation of his services to the Society.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, December 15, 1909.

Two famous stars in the realms of operatic art recently claimed the attention of the public. Madame Lili Lehmann sang at the Imperial Opera and Madame Gemma Bellincioni made several appearances at the Volksoper. Madame Lehmann seems to possess the secret of eternal youth. Her personal appearance is still brilliant, her acting is full of youthful grace, and even her voice and technical powers show scarcely any signs of decline. She had the greatest triumphs in the parts of Fidelio and Isolda. Her rendering of the latter constituted a brilliant object-lesson, showing conclusively that Wagner's music should not only be declaimed but also sung. Madame Bellincioni is still able, owing to her artistic intellect and warm temperament, to create dramatic effects in parts like Tosca and Carmen. With her appeared also at the Volksoper, Messrs. Bonci and de Luca.

The director of the Imperial Opera, Herr von Weingartner, has now so far recovered from his accident that he was able to conduct a performance at the Opera, as well as some of his own compositions at a concert of the Singakademie, on both of which occasions he received the heartiest welcome from the public. Herr von Weingartner was announced to direct the performance of the re-staged 'Meistersinger,' on December 17, and will resume his position as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, which, during his enforced absence, have been excellently directed by Herr Schalk. The programme of the third of these concerts, which took place on December 5, contained, besides Richard Strauss's symphonic caricature 'Don Quixote' and Beethoven's fourth Symphony, the Pianoforte concerto in E minor by Chopin, in the solo part of which Herr Moriz Rosenthal caused the greatest enthusiasm.

The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde has performed a highly praiseworthy task in giving for the first time a performance of Bach's Christmas oratorio, without cuts, on two consecutive evenings. Herr Schalk conducted; the choral and orchestral parts were taken by the Singverein and the orchestra of the Konzertverein, and a fine solo quartet was furnished by Mesdames Senius-Erler and Cahier, and Messrs. Senius and Messchaert.

RICHARD VON PERGER.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Festival Choral Society's second concert of the current series was given in the Town Hall on December 9, and consisted of a concert performance of Saint-Saëns's Biblical opera 'Samson and Delilah,' which was first introduced to local notice by the City Choral Society, under Mr. Fred W. Beard's conductorship, in October, 1901. The work had been well prepared by Dr. Sinclair, and under his watchful beat an altogether admirable rendering was given, choir and orchestra most ably discharging their onerous duties. Madame Kirkby Lunn, who, in this country, has made the part of Delilah her own, sang with all the charm and fascination that always characterize her efforts. Mr. Walter Hyde gave Samson with dramatic fervour, and Mr. Frederic Austin sang effectively the part of the High Priest of Dagon.

A concert was given in the Town Hall on December 16, in aid of the Queen's Hospital, specially organized by Messrs. Scotcher & Sons. The executive were the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, conducted for the first time by our clever pianist, Mr. Arthur Cooke. The programme comprised the Overture to 'Oberon,' Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un Faune,' Liszt's second 'Hungarian' Rhapsody, &c. Mr. William Henley was the solo violinist, and gave a brilliant rendering of Tchaikovsky's Concerto, and the vocalist was Miss Ethel Hook.

The Royal Society of Artists' musical matinees in connection with the autumn exhibition of pictures terminated on December 11, the occasion being the 360th concert given under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction, covering a period of eighteen consecutive years. The programme included Bach's Triple concerto for three pianofortes and strings, and a Suite by Arensky for two pianofortes. These concerts have proved a valuable educational factor in the musical doings of this city.

Among the miscellaneous concerts mention should be made of the following excellent musical functions: Mr. Max Mossel at his second drawing-room concert of the season at the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, December 2, gave a typical chamber concert with his string quartet, the programme comprising Beethoven's second 'Rasumowski' quartet (Op. 58), composed in 1806, and Ernst von Dohnányi's Pianoforte quintet in C minor (Op. 1), heard here for the first time, Madame Marie Fromm playing the pianoforte part. The Clifton Quintet also held their second chamber concert of the season in the Queen's College on December 7, when they gave a good rendering of Mozart's String quartet in B flat and Schumann's Pianoforte quintet, with Mr. Herbert Parsons at the pianoforte, the vocalist being Mr. Frederic Erle (baritone). Several concerts in connection with the Midland Institute School of Music were given in the large Lecture Theatre, namely, a Beethoven Sonata recital by Mr. Arthur Cooke (December 11); a song and pianoforte recital, at which a number of songs composed by Miss Winifred Kingsford were introduced (December 4); and an orchestral concert, conducted by the Principal, Professor Granville Bantock, the chief feature being the first performance in Birmingham of Kalinnikoff's Symphony, No. 1, in G minor (December 13). Mr. Wymark Stratton gave an interesting concert at the Masonic Hall (December 10), a welcome revival being Beethoven's Septet for strings, clarinet, horn and bassoon, which has not been heard here for some years.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL, BATH, AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Bristol New Philharmonic Society, on November 24, held its winter concert at the Victoria Rooms, and gratified a large audience by excellent performances of the Pianoforte concerto in B flat (Op. 83, No. 2) by Brahms, with Miss Jenny Meid at the solo instrument, and J. F. Barnett's 'Paradise and the Peri.' The soloists in the cantata were the Misses Eveline and Katharine Gerrish and Gertrude Winchester, and Messrs. R. Hoare Byers and Arthur Trowbridge. Mr. Harold Bernard was leader, and Mr. Arnold Barter directed the concert.

On November 26, the Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its third season at the Victoria Rooms, Mr. Hubert W. Hunt conducting. The most important work presented was the Symphony in D (Op. 73, No. 2) by Brahms, which was carefully interpreted. Admirable renderings were given of the symphonic poem 'La jeunesse d'Hercules' (Op. 50), by Saint-Saëns, and the overtures to 'Don Giovanni' and 'Tannhäuser.'

The Bristol Musical Society, on December 4, gave its first concert of the eighth season at the Victoria Rooms in the presence of a large audience. Choir and band numbered 250, Mr. F. S. Gardner being leader and Mr. C. W. Stear conductor. Concert selections from German's 'A Princess of Kensington' and Gounod's 'Faust' were performed, with Miss Emily Breare, Miss Amy Richards, Mr. Gwilym Richards and Mr. Dan Price as the principal vocalists.

On December 11 a concert was given in the large hall of Bristol University by the Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. Cedric Bucknall. The University orchestra had before appeared, but this was the first occasion upon which the choir (numbering forty members) took part. A well-arranged scheme of compositions was done justice to by both singers and players.

The Society of Bristol Gleemen gave their annual Ladies' Night on December 15 at the Victoria Rooms. Miss Edith Evans was engaged as the special vocalist, and in addition to her songs she took the solo in Hiller's 'O world, thou art wondrous fair,' with the choir. Several pieces which the Society had not before given were heard, one a new glee, 'Night thoughts,' words by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, composed by Mr. W. J. Kidner (conductor). The contribution, which deserves favourable mention, was well received.

The Sine Nomine Choral Society gave a concert in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Society, St. James's Square, on December 15. Gade's 'Crusaders' and a miscellaneous selection were performed. Mr. Robert Simmons conducted.

The Bath Choral and Orchestral Society, on December 7, gave a performance of 'Elijah' at the Assembly Rooms. Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth were the principal vocalists, and Mr. H. T. Sims directed the performance, which was very creditable.

The Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, on December 9, presented a Mendelssohn programme at the Knightstone Pavilion. Mr. Edward Cooke, of Bristol, conducting an admirable rendering of the 'Hymn of Praise,' 'The First Walpurgis Night,' and four part-songs; the soloists being Miss Gladys Moger (Bath), Miss Clara Aldersley (Bristol), Mr. John Prout, and Mr. D. Byndon-Ayres. As usual the band was made up largely of Bristol musicians, with Mr. F. S. Gardner as leader.

MUSIC IN CAMBRIDGE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The outstanding musical event of the term has been the production of Dr. Vaughan Williams's music to the 'Wasps,' which is noticed on page 26.

Mr. Beecham and his orchestra visited Cambridge on October 30. His programme included the Elgar Symphony and Dr. Charles Wood's fine variations on 'Patrick Sarsfield.'

There have been three 'Wednesday' concerts of the University Musical Society. On October 27 the Folk-Song Quartet sang the 'Neue Liebeslieder' of Brahms, and their other contributions included the very striking setting by Dr. Walford Davies of 'A kid, a kid.' Miss Kathleen Chabot was the pianist. The Bohemian Quartet on November 10 played quartets by Haydn, Verdi, and Beethoven. On December 6, Herr von Warlich gave a delightful recital of a series of Goethe poems set by Schubert, and later on a series of German ballads. Herr Erich Hammacher accompanied, and also contributed a performance of the 'Sonata Appassionata.'

MUSIC IN DEVON AND CORNWALL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE THREE TOWNS.

Choral music in Plymouth has during this season undergone considerable change. The large and fine combination conducted by the borough organist, Mr. H. Moreton, at the Guildhall Choir has, to the great loss of the musical public, been disbanded, owing to the refusal of the Municipal Council to allow such prices to be charged for admission to the performances as would ensure a clear balance, the rendering of such works as 'The Dream of Gerontius,' 'The Redemption,' 'The Spectre's Bride,' and others of like importance, entailing an expenditure which could not be recovered by the standard prices of the Corporation concerts. Therefore a regrettable gap is felt in the music of the district. The swing of the pendulum has, however, brought about a tentative revival of Dr. Weekes's Choral Society, which has not attempted a big work for some seasons. Profiting by a new concession in the price of hire of the Guildhall offered by the Corporation to local musicians, and by the reaction consequent on the disbanding of the Guildhall Choir, Dr. Weekes, on December 1, gave a performance of 'Elijah' by his choir, assisted by his orchestral society. The event was successful from every point of view, and the singing of the choir, in spite of numerical lack of basses, was effective, refined in tone and expression, and efficient. The principals were Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Mabel Braine, Mr. Albert Collings, Mr. Dalton Baker, Miss May Groser, Miss Ethel Randell, Messrs. Edward Cooper, J. J. Kent, and W. P. Toby. The only other choral society that has given a performance is the Emmanuel Choral Society, which devotes its attention to sacred music only. On December 15, Mr. Reginald Waddy conducted selections from 'The Messiah,' and Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm and some ancient carols. The band was led by Mr. A. E. Serle, with Mr. David Parkes at the organ.

In orchestral music Mr. Frank Winterbottom opened the season with a symphony concert at Stonehouse on November 5, when the symphony was 'From the New World' (Dvorák). Schubert's Octet for strings and wind soli was played, and a first performance here was given of a number—'A song of thanksgiving'—from Mackenzie's Orchestral suite 'London day by day.' At the second concert, on December 3, the symphony was Mendelssohn's 'Italian.' Dr. Weekes's private Orchestral Society gave the first of its two annual concerts on November 17, Dr. Weekes and Mr. Walter Weekes dividing the duties of conducting. The D minor Violin concerto of Max Bruch was played, with Miss Florence Wooland as soloist. Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' symphony was also included.

Chamber music virtually depends on the efforts of the Misses Smith, whose enterprise and interest deserve all encouragement. On October 25, at their twelfth concert, they produced for the first time in Plymouth the second Pianoforte trio of Arensky, in F minor, Miss Florence Smith being at the pianoforte, with Miss Lily Smith, violin, and Mrs. H. R. Freeman (née Miss Emma Smith), violoncello. Madame Aurlia Dawkins was the vocalist. A violin and pianoforte recital by Mr. Percy Lowman (recently returned from the Brussels Conservatoire) and Mr. Harold Lake, on October 27, deserves mention.

Lovers of amateur opera are well catered for in Plymouth, though the first half of the season has been, as usual, principally occupied by preparation. A highly successful six days' performance of 'The Gondoliers,' by the Plymouth Amateur Operatic Society, occupied the stage of the Theatre Royal from November 29. The singing of the chorus was the most notably fine feature, the balance, tone, attack and expression being quite exceptionally good. Mr. R. H. V. Ball was musical director, and Miss Lilian Blight accompanist.

The Devon and Cornwall Amateur Operatic Society gave a miscellaneous performance on November 24, directed by Mr. R. Pengelly. Mention must also be made of a series of performances on and after October 12 of the opera 'Ib and little Christina,' in aid of a local charity, conducted by Mr. John Pardew.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The interesting Choral Society in the moorland village of Brent, on November 25, performed Heinrich Hofmann's cantata 'Melusina,' conducted by Mr. David Parkes. The chorus singing was bright in tone, and prompt. The Choral Society at Plympton, which has been in the hands of Mr. Walter Weekes for several years has, owing to his resignation, been re-organized under the conductorship of Mr. David Parkes, and a concert will shortly take place. The old-established Musical Association at Torquay, whose performances are invariably of a high order, gave 'Hiawatha's Departure' on November 24. Mr. T. H. Webb conducted. The singing of the chorus was marked by fine intelligence of expression and musical tone. Eaton Fanning's part-song 'The moonlight,' and overtures by Cherubini and Schumann were included. The Barnstaple Festival Musical Society, on November 29, gave a miscellaneous concert, introducing pieces by Mr. Hubert Bath, a native of Barnstaple, who conducted his own works. Part-songs, &c., by the choir, were conducted by Mr. Sidney Harper, in the regretted absence, owing to indisposition, of the honorary conductor, Mr. H. J. Edwards. On December 15, Mr. Bennett, conductor of the Holsworthy Choral Society, obtained a very good performance of Barnett's 'The building of the ship.' The bracing country air of North Devon was reflected in the energetic and bright tone of the choir. On December 17, the Yelverton Choral Society rendered the 'Hymn of Praise,' under the direction of Mr. Walter Weekes.

An orchestral concert, conducted by Mr. F. W. Benson and led by Miss Ham, given at Paignton on December 1, included Schubert's B flat Symphony, a four-movement Overture by Bach, and movements by Beethoven and Gurliitt. Mr. Frederick Norcup was the vocalist. As outstanding events we may mention the visits to Exeter of the Beecham Orchestra (October 23) and the Queen's Hall Orchestra (November 11), on both of which occasions the Elgar Symphony was played.

CORNWALL.

Few performances have as yet been given in Cornwall, where most of the Societies make themselves heard, as a rule, during the second part of the season. The Torpoint Choral Association, however, which has obtained a new lease of life under the guidance of Mr. F. W. Moreton, gave on December 8 a good performance of Goring Thomas's 'The sun worshippers' and Gounod's 'Gallia,' both works being new to the district. The choir, not as strong numerically as on former occasions, was well-balanced and conscientious.

A new choral Society has been formed at Callington, and already numbers eighty voices. Under the conductorship of Mr. J. H. Lucas, of Plymouth, Smart's 'The bride of Dunkerron' is in rehearsal.

The Redruth Amateur Operatic and Dramatic Society gave three performances of 'The Mikado,' beginning on December 7.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

On November 25, the Dublin Orchestral Society gave their fourth concert for the season. The programme included Mozart's 'Magic Flute' overture; Beethoven's fifth Symphony; Wagner's 'Parsifal' Vorspiel, 'Klingsor's Magic garden,' and the 'Walkürenritt.' The 'Parsifal' selections were played for the first time by the Society. The orchestra was conducted, as usual, by Dr. Esposito, to whom great credit is due for a very successful performance.

On December 1, the Royal Irish Academy of Music gave the annual concert. The orchestra, under Dr. T. R. G. Józé, opened the concert with Chopin's 'Marche Funèbre' in memory of the late Sir Francis Brady, one of the founders of the Academy. Miss Kathleen Rooke, Miss Ella Scott and Miss Mary Delany were the vocalists, Miss Sophie Vance and Miss Kathleen Hinds the pianists, Miss Bertha Dowse and Miss Nora Byrne the violinists, and Miss Lilian Dowse the violoncellist.

On the same evening the North City Choral Society (conductor, Mr. George Harrison) gave a performance of Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' with orchestral accompaniment. Miss Lena Munro, Miss Alicia Keogh, Mr. Robert Harrison and Mr. Robert Cobbe were the solo vocalists.

On December 7 the Misses Marie, Bertha, Hilda and Lilian Dowse gave a string quartet recital, assisted by Mr. Montague Borwell (vocalist), Miss Annie Lord (pianist), and Mr. C. W. Wilson (accompanist). The quartets were Haydn (Op. 77) in F and Schumann in A minor; and Miss Marie Dowse and Miss Annie Lord played Saint-Saëns's Sonata in E flat for violin and pianoforte.

At the Royal Dublin Society the Monday Chamber Music Recitals have been given by Bruno Muggellini, pianoforte recital (November 22), and the Esposito-Beel Quintet (November 29 and December 6), who played the Brahms Pianoforte quartet in A major, the Schumann Pianoforte quartet in E flat, the Arensky Pianoforte quintet (Op. 51), and the Dvorák quintet. Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees and Dr. Esposito gave a beautiful rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in A major for violoncello and pianoforte, and Mr. Sigmund Beel played, very finely, Vitali's 'Chaconne' for violin solo with pianoforte accompaniment.

The Sunday Orchestral Concerts continue to attract large audiences. The programmes during last month included Beethoven's fourth and fifth Symphonies, Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, and the 'Waldstein' Sonata, played by Dr. Esposito.

On Friday, December 10, the College Choral Society gave a second performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, on the same lines as that of last year. The work, as on the previous occasion, created a deep impression. Mr. Charles Marchant conducted, and Mr. Arthur Darley led the orchestra, which, like the chorus, is largely composed of amateurs. The solos were sung by members of the Society.

On December 15, the Leinster School of Music concert and distribution of prizes was held in the Antient Concert Rooms. Choral items were conducted by Madame Quinton Rosse and the orchestra by Mr. Joshua F. Watson.

On the same evening, in the Aberdeen Hall, Miss Edith Vance, a former pupil of Herr Bast, recently returned from studying in Leipzig, and Miss Goldney Chitty gave a recital of solo and duet violoncello music, assisted by Madame Borel and Miss Madeleine Moore (accompanist).

On December 16 the Dublin Orchestral Society gave its last concert for the season. Dr. Esposito conducted a very good performance of Brahms's Symphony No. 3, in F. The programme also included an Aria by Alessandro Scarlatti, arranged for strings by Dr. Esposito; a Gigue by Martucci; Dvorák's 'In der Natur'; Wagner's 'Trauermarsch,' from 'Götterdämmerung'; and 'Entrance of the gods into Walhalla,' from 'Rheingold.'

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the second of Messrs. Paterson's orchestral concerts, given in the McEwan Hall on November 22, M. Wassili Safonoff, the batonless conductor, directed the orchestra. The works performed were Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony; Tchaikovsky's Symphony in F minor (No. 4); Schumann's 'Manfred' overture; and the Good Friday music from Wagner's 'Parsifal.' M. Safonoff possesses a magnetic personality, is a believer in strong contrasts, and secured some beautiful effects.

On November 29, Dr. Cowen conducted the third concert, of which the special feature of interest was the first performance in Edinburgh of Elgar's Symphony in A flat. The Symphony was splendidly performed and had a most enthusiastic reception, Dr. Cowen having to respond to numerous recalls and eventually signalling to the orchestra to rise and share the honours with him. The other purely orchestral numbers were Schubert's 'Des Teufels Lustschloss' overture; Charpentier's 'Serenade' from 'Impressions d'Italie'; and Dvorák's 'Carnival' overture. The vocalist was Miss Eve Simony.

The fourth concert, on December 6, was conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald. The programme included Weber's 'Oberon' overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony in E minor (No. 5), the Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde,' and a 'Birthday' overture by Landon Ronald. The soloist was M. Jóska Szizeti, who gave a most artistic performance of Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor.

At the fifth concert, on December 13, Dr. Cowen conducting, the programme contained Beethoven's 'Fidelio' overture (No. 4), the Allegro and Variations from Serenade No. 12 for wind instruments, by Mozart, the Prelude to Act 2 of 'The Wreckers' by Ethel Smyth, Vincent d'Indy's trilogy 'Wallenstein,' and Mendelssohn's 'Ray Blas' overture. The vocalist was Madame Kirkby Lunn, who sang with rare expression the aria 'Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix,' from Saint-Saëns's 'Samson et Dalila,' and was heard later in songs by Mallinson and MacDowell. Mr. Scott Jupp accompanied.

At the third of Mr. Simpson's classical concerts, given in the Music Hall on November 20, the St. Petersburg Quartet made a welcome re-appearance in Edinburgh. The quartets performed were Beethoven's in D major (Op. 18, No. 3) and Tchaikovsky's in D (Op. 11). The vocalist was Mrs. George Swinton, who sang to an orchestral accompaniment four songs by Miss Ethel Smyth, conducted by the composer. At the fourth concert, on December 18, the Queen's Hall String Sextet gave splendid performances of Brahms's Sextet in B flat major (Op. 18) and Tchaikovsky's 'Souvenir de Florence' (Op. 70). Miss Ada Forrest, who took the place of Mrs. Henry J. Wood, sang with much acceptance.

Herr Ernst Denhof, assisted by the Sévick Quartet and Mr. E. C. Hedmond, gave the second of his chamber concerts in the Freemasons' Hall on December 11. The concerted music, which throughout was finely performed, comprised Dvorák's Quartet, Op. 105, in A flat major; Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 95, in F minor, and the Brahms Pianoforte quartet, Op. 26, in A major. Mr. Hedmond's cultured method of vocalisation was heard to great advantage in the aria 'Dein Bildnis ist bezaubernd schön' from Mozart's 'Magic Flute,' and in songs by Schubert, Schumann and Adolf Jensen. Mr. Scott Jupp accompanied.

In the Freemasons' Hall, on November 23, Miss Shephard-Walwyn, assisted by Miss Marion Richardson (vocalist), with Mr. Arthur Dace at the pianoforte, gave a highly successful violin recital. The programme was on ambitious lines, embracing as it did compositions by Mozart, Beethoven, Max Bruch, Sarasate and others; but in each number Miss Walwyn displayed fine tone and certainty of intonation, and her performance gave promise of still greater achievements. Miss Richardson, a soprano with a full, rich voice, sang a number of songs in excellent style, and the musicianly playing of Mr. Dace—who took the place of Mr. Francis Gibson—added much to the interest of the recital.

The programme of the second of the University Historical Concerts, given in the Music Class Room on December 2, consisted of four String quartets by Mozart, viz., in B flat (1773), G major (1782), C major (1785), and F major (1790). These examples of Mozart's genius in this species of composition were delightfully interpreted by the Verbruggen Quartet.

Among other concerts given during the month have been a vocal and pianoforte recital by Miss Grainger-Kerr and Mr. Hubert Bath; a vocal recital by the Misses Salter, assisted by Mr. A. M. Henderson, pianist; a pianoforte recital by Mr. T. P. Fielding, and a vocal recital by Miss Belle Thynne, assisted by Herr Ernst Kosting, violinist.

In the November issue reference was made to Herr Ernst Denhof's proposed scheme of giving, in conjunction with the Carl Rosa Opera Company, performances of two complete cycles of Wagner's 'Nibelungen Ring.' For some time the production of even one cycle was a matter of uncertainty, but now the scheme has been taken up so heartily that the performance of both cycles is assured. The performances will be given in the King's Theatre, the first cycle beginning on February 28, the second on March 7.

Mrs. Alexander Maitland's choir and orchestra—the latter composed chiefly of ladies—with Mr. George Henschel as solo vocalist, gave a concert in the Music Hall on December 17. The works performed included a selection from Gluck's 'Orfeo,' Brahms's 'Funeral Anthem,' a group of madrigals, and Handel's 'Coronation Anthem.' The choir sings with a commendable degree of tunefulness, smoothness and precision, but a little more animation and variety of tone-colour would raise the standard of excellence to a much higher level. Mr. Henschel, who accompanied himself, sang with consummate art a group of his own 'Trumpeter Lieder' and songs by Beethoven, Schumann, Loewe and others.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Two notable events took place just too late to be included in last month's letter, viz., Mr. A. M. Henderson's second chamber concert, at which the famous St. Petersburg Quartet appeared, and a remarkable performance of Mendelssohn's 'Italian' symphony and Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony in F minor by the Scottish Orchestra, under M. Wassili Safonoff, at the second Classical Concert.

On December 2 the Amateur Orchestral Society (Mr. W. T. Hoek, conductor) and the Bach Choir (Mr. J. M. Diack, conductor) combined their forces in a most successful concert. The choral numbers were 'God so loved the world' and 'A stronghold sure,' and in these the Bach Choir sang with a precision and vim worthy of all commendation. In the accompaniments the Amateur Orchestral Society did capital work, ably supported by Mr. Herbert Walton at the organ, and the solo music was effectively given by Miss Eva Rich and Mr. Herbert Brown. The purely orchestral numbers on the programme included the overture to Mozart's 'La Clemenza di Tito,' a very effective suite from Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis,' and Beethoven's 'Egmont' overture. At the third Classical Concert, on November 30, Elgar's Symphony in A flat was given for the first time in Glasgow, and in this remarkable work the playing of the Scottish Orchestra under Dr. Cowen reached the highest level. The Symphony was again performed at the Saturday Popular Concert on December 4. The Choral Union made their first appearance this season at the fourth Classical Concert on December 7, in a Mendelssohn programme which included Part I. of 'St. Paul,' and the 13th and 114th Psalms. Under Dr. Coward's energetic direction the choruses were sung with great brilliance to the accompaniments of the Scottish Orchestra, with Mr. J. E. Hodgson as organist. The soloists were Misses Mary Conly and Maria Yelland, and Messrs. Henry Brearley and Thorpe Bates. Three novelties were given at the fifth Classical Concert on December 14: the Prelude to Act II. of Miss Ethel Smyth's 'The Wreckers,' Vincent D'Indy's Trilogy for orchestra after Schiller's 'Wallenstein,' and Mozart's fifth Violin concerto in A major, the solo part in the last-named being beautifully played by Mr. Maurice Sons, a former leader of the Scottish Orchestra, who, on making his re-appearance in Glasgow, received a very cordial welcome from his many friends and admirers.

On December 15 the choir of Claremont Chapel, assisted by Mr. Hutton Malcolm's male-voice choir, gave some unfamiliar pieces by César Franck, Gelbke, Brahms and Hummel with fine effect. The performance was directed by Mr. Hutton Malcolm, the organist and choirmaster of the church, who also contributed some organ solos. The annual concert by the Choral and Orchestral Societies of that flourishing institution, the Athenæum School of Music, took place on December 16. Mr. Henri Verbruggen, the conductor of the Societies, is to be congratulated on bringing forward such numbers as a Concerto grosso, by Handel; Sonata in A, by Corelli; Haydn's familiar Serenade for strings, and the Prelude to Saint-Saëns's 'The Deluge,' as well as some carefully chosen madrigals and part-songs. Of the songs performed, Bach's 'Schlage doch' was particularly acceptable.

MUSIC IN GLOUCESTER AND CHELTENHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Gloucester Choral Society held their first concert of the season on December 14. The principal work performed was Sir Edward Elgar's 'King Olaf,' under Dr. A. Herbert Brewer, and a splendid rendering was given by the choir, orchestra and soloists. Madame Le Mar is a Gloucester favourite, and she had never been heard to greater advantage; Mr. Cynlais Gibbs created a very favourable impression, whilst Mr. Frederic Austin's sonorous voice admirably suited his part. Besides 'King Olaf' Dr. Brewer's 'In Springtime' Suite of songs for tenor voice with male-voice choir was given, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs being quite at home in the solo part. The large band, which included many members of the Gloucestershire Orchestral Society, and was led by Mr. W. H. Reed, played well throughout.

For the first time, Miss Marie Hall played in Gloucester on November 30 and was enthusiastically received. Her contributions were the Concerto in G minor (Max Bruch); 'Ave Maria' (Schubert-Wilhelm); 'Moment musicale' (Schubert); 'Scherzo-Tarantelle' (Wieniawski); 'Vota Aragonesa' (Sarasate); and the 'Moise' fantasia for the G string, by Paganini. Miss Hall was assisted by Miss Louie Basche (solo pianist), and Mr. C. Stewart Edwards (baritone), both of whom gained golden opinions. The band of the Gloucestershire Hussars also played the '1812' Symphony of Tchaikovsky and other pieces.

The meeting of the three choirs of Gloucester, Worcester and Hereford will be held this year at Gloucester, and it is interesting to note that the Mayor (Mr. F. Hannam-Clark) and the City High Sheriff (Dr. E. Dykes Bowers) are well-known musical men. With their wives they will appear in a 'Civic quartet' before the inmates of the Gloucester Royal Infirmary on December 28, and later at two public dinners given to the poor of the City.

The Bristol Royal Orpheus Society visited Cheltenham Town Hall on December 9, and gave a concert in aid of the Cheltenham General Hospital. Mr. George Riseley conducted, and the programme was as follows: 'Strike the lyre,' (T. Cooke), 'Love's slumber song' (S. E. Lovatt), 'The old soldier's dream' (Peter Cornelius), 'Go, speed thy flight' (F. Otto), 'Dance of gnomes' (E. MacDowell), 'Peace' (C. Lee Williams), 'The pedlar's song' (C. Lee Williams), two cavalier songs, 'Marching along' and 'Give a rouse' (Granville Bantock), 'What ho!' (W. Beale), 'Stars of the summer night' (Cruikshank), 'The phantom host' (Hegar), 'Dick Turpin' (Sir F. Bridge), 'The long day closes' (Sullivan), and 'The gongs are beating' (Julius Otto). Miss Gertrude Winchester and Mr. Charles Knowles also assisted.

On November 21 a pleasant concert took place at Cheltenham, when Mlle. Alice Vreut, Miss Edna Thornton, Mr. Mark Hambourg and Mons. Brinkmann (solo violinist), contributed to the programme, and Mr. Cyril Towsey accompanied.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the fourth Philharmonic concert, on November 23, Vincent D'Indy's Trilogy 'Wallenstein,' comprising: (1) Wallenstein's Camp, (2) Max and Thekla, (3) Death of Wallenstein, was played for the first time here in its entirety, when the vividly descriptive music received a brilliant performance under Dr. Cowen's direction. In Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, Mr. Harold Bauer played the solo part with musicianly skill and intuition, and the vocalist, Mr. Paul Schmides, made a favourable impression in Beethoven's 'Adelaida.' The fifth concert, on December 7, was remarkable for the Society's first performance of Elgar's Symphony, which, under Dr. Cowen's direction, served to quicken and deepen appreciation of this great work. The vocalist, Madame Edvina, was especially well heard in Charpentier's 'Air de Louise.'

Hugo Kaun's Symphony in D minor (Op. 22) received a second performance in Liverpool on November 30, when it was played by the Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Vasco Akeroyd. The composer, born in Berlin, 1863, is now resident in America, where he composed this symphony 'An mein Vaterland,' written on classical lines with considerable invention and resource. Considerable interest attached to the first appearance of the youthful violin prodigy, Master Eddy Brown, who displayed extraordinary facility in Mendelssohn's E minor Concerto.

Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' was performed by the Post Office Choral Society, conducted by Mr. P. Ingram, on December 8, the vocal principals being Madame de Vere Sapio, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Robert Radford. The result was a highly commendable performance.

On December 16, Mr. Egon Petri completed his series of four Beethoven recitals, which have been interesting and instructive.

The second Schiever concert on December 11 was devoted to Beethoven's Quartet in D (Op. 18), the C major (Op. 59), and the B flat (Op. 130), in which the players associated with Mr. Ernst Schiever fully maintained the high standard of these notable chamber concerts.

At the Rawdon Briggs Chamber Concert on November 29, Dr. Ernest Walker's Pianoforte quintet in A major made a favourable impression as an interesting and scholarly work. The strings were also agreeably heard in Volkmann's Quartet No. 4, in E minor, and Beethoven's (Op. 132) A minor Quartet. A similar noteworthy concert was given on December 13 by an accomplished quartet of ladies, Miss Edith Robinson, Miss Isabel McCullagh, Miss Lily Simms and Miss May McCullagh, whose ensemble playing was well displayed in Beethoven's F minor (Op. 95), Mr. Balfour Gardiner's Quartet in one movement, and in Schumann's Quintet (pianoforte, Mr. George Rathbone). The vocalist was Mrs. Norman Melland.

An event of exceptional importance was M. Paderewski's recital on November 27, when the great pianist attracted and impressed a large audience.

At the concert of the Liscard Orchestral Society on November 27, Mr. Tobias Matthay's Concert Piece in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra was cleverly played by his pupil, Miss Dorothy Wahlers. The composition is written in the form of a symphonic series of variations. Mr. Horace Cropper was heard to advantage as a violinist in Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso (Op. 28), and the large orchestra, conducted by Mr. P. R. Smart, played with animation. The vocalist was Miss Winifred Thomas.

Mr. Donald Tovey lectured at the University, on November 19, on 'Dramatic Music' in connection with purely instrumental modern works, whether 'descriptive' or not, with illustrations from Beethoven's sonata 'Les adieux' and 'Coriolanus' overture, D'Indy's 'Wallenstein,' and Elgar's Symphony in A flat. His subject on December 3 was Beethoven's Quartet in B flat (Op. 130), and on December 17 'Architectural Music,' illustrated by Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio.' In connection with the Corporation free lectures, Mr. Alfred Perceval Graves gave an interesting address on 'Manx Music,' on November 24.

Mr. F. Brandon Cheshire gave a lecture-recital on Chopin before the local section of the I.S.M. on December 10.

The Welsh Choral Union's performance of the 'Messiah,' on December 18, drew a crowded and appreciative assembly to the Philharmonic Hall. The occasion again added to the Welsh choir's laurels. Nothing could be finer than their forceful singing. The vocal principals were Miss Edith Evans, Miss Maria Yelland, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Herbert Brown. Mr. Harry Evans's conducting had its usual inspiring effect on his forces.

The Ormskirk Musical Association gave a highly creditable performance, on December 15, of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha,' and of Dr. James Lyon's choral ballad, 'The Warden of the Cinque Ports.' Mr. John Ball conducted, and the soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Mr. R. Charlesworth, and Mr. Robert Duckworth (violinist).

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A feature of Manchester musical life calculated to impress the stranger within our gates is the number of concerts, given publicly, or by semi-private subscription societies, devoted to string chamber-music. The Brodsky Quartet was the first in the field fourteen years ago; now one finds in addition local quartets led by Mr. Rawdon Briggs, Mr. Arthur Catterall and Miss Edith Robinson, besides the visits from celebrated Continental players—all of which argues a gratifying growth of interest in this, the severest and purest form of music, and the past month has witnessed performances of notable interest in this branch of musical art. Miss Edith Robinson is engaged at the Royal Manchester College of Music, and in quartet work is associated with Miss Lily Simms and the Misses Isabel and Mary McCullagh. Their first concert brought the performance of two works quite new to Manchester audiences: Balfour Gardiner's quartet Allegro movement played at the recent Musical League concerts in Liverpool, and Hugo Wolf's 'Italienische Serenade' in the quartet arrangement—the orchestral version happily being well known here. Mr. Francis Harford, now professor at the College of Music, was the vocalist. At the next concert by these musicians, Donald Tovey's Quintet for pianoforte and strings will be heard for the first time in Manchester. Some months ago the Brodsky Quartet performed two movements of an unfinished work by Grieg, and after the composer's death sketches were discovered of a slow movement, and material for the concluding section of the work, which have enabled Mr. Julius Röntgen, of Amsterdam, to complete the quartet, which has recently been given for the first time in its entirety by Dr. Brodsky and his well-known colleagues. When Grieg was last a visitor in Manchester he was much impressed by the playing of this distinguished quartet, and not improbably this posthumous composition was written in fulfilment of a promise then made to compose a work for them.

The Hallé Concerts continue to pursue the well-trodden path of classical masterpieces, Dr. Richter's predilections being clearly revealed in the programmes played weekly. The warm welcome extended to the few novelties so far heard this season should encourage the responsible authorities to be less timorous in their excursions into the unknown territory of orchestral music. In this connection

Mr. E. J. Broadfield's statement at the annual meeting of the Royal Manchester College of Music is not without interest: 'I am not sure that some of us are not beginning to wish the programmes (for concerts generally) were not so scientific and learned as they sometimes are, and that we might hear some of the old things that delighted us thirty years ago.'

The ultra-conservative and unadventurous policy of the Hallé executive is certainly in keeping with such views. The month's concerts have embraced Berlioz's 'Faust,' a Wagner evening, the annual performance of the 'Messiah,' and two orchestral concerts, at one of which Mr. Frederick Dawson played brilliantly in the César Franck Variations. That his powers are not exclusively of the 'Oktavenbändiger' order was proved by his highly imaginative playing of Debussy pieces. Lady Hallé's reading of Mendelssohn's well-worn Concerto was conspicuous for its rhythmic freedom and undoubted grace. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and the Schumann No. 2 have also been heard, the former played without much inspiration, and the latter pronounced dull and heavy. Elgar's Allegro for string quartet and orchestra was superbly played, Richter's heavy bass giving a grand foundation. The orchestral playing in 'Faust' was supremely good: not so the chorus work. Mrs. Henry J. Wood, Messrs. Walter Hyde, Frederic Austin and Fowler Burton were the best all-round quartet we have had here in this work of recent years. On December 16, after a lapse of a few years, came another performance of the most colossal closing scene from 'Götterdämmerung,' sung this time by Miss Perceval Allen. We had Richter in his majesty and might amidst scenes of the greatest animation.

Manchester, for years past, has been opera-starved. As showing how hard times have been, the performance of Verdi's 'La Forza del Destino' by the Carl Rosa Company, under Mr. Walter van Noorden, at the beginning of December, has been hailed as quite a notable incident, and later in the month the Moody-Manners Company, under Mr. Richard Eckhold's conductorship, gave 'Aida,' 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Eugene Onegin,' 'La Tosca,' and 'Madama Butterfly,' and Gatty's new 'Duke or Devil' (noticed separately on p. 24), making the most interesting and varied musical week ever given in a Manchester theatre. Manchester inhabitants are good theatre-goers, and, proportionately to population, probably no English area contains so many music-lovers; yet, with Richter and his orchestra in our midst, Edinburgh has the honour of giving the first cycle of the Wagnerian Ring dramas outside London. We want a theatre to do for opera what Miss Horniman's now famed Gaiety company has done for drama. Somewhat allied to opera has been the performance at the Victoria University of Milton's 'Comus,' with Harry Lawes's musical accompaniments. Mr. F. Bonavia directed the Royal College of Music orchestra, and had arranged for this occasion a most appropriate suite of old Italian pieces for strings. Dr. Henry Watson played his harpsichord; Miss Edith McCullagh as the Lady, Miss Una Lynde as Sabrina, Mr. Siegfried Herford and Mr. Eric Baker as the Brothers, Mr. Arthur Cooper as Comus, and Mr. W. J. Douglas as the Attendant Spirit did effective work.

The Saturday evening organ recitals at the Town Hall, by Dr. Kendrick Pyne, always a noteworthy feature in Manchester's aesthetic life, have been discontinued for the present, owing to structural alterations, so that organ solos by Mr. David Clegg on the Free Trade Hall instrument at the fifth Promenade concert acquired somewhat unusual interest: his 'Poem Misterioso for a modern concert organ' only proved a vehicle for a showy technical display. For the last Promenade concert of the year Mr. Speelman had drafted quite an ideal programme—English music of the worthiest order by Stanford, Elgar, Mackenzie and Bantock, in company with lesser-known works by Rubinstein, Liszt, Svendsen, Weber and Sibelius ('King Christian II.' suite). Miss Phyllis Lett sang Bantock's 'Sappho' songs, and Mr. Needham played flute solos.

Madame Kirkby Lunn, Manchester's greatest singer, gave a lengthy recital at the Gentlemen's Concerts, exhibiting a glorious vocal equipment and a great range of expression. Miss Elena Gerhardt made deep and lasting impressions at the Harrison concert in Brahms, Schubert, Strauss and Wolf lieder, and very few of these concerts have given such unalloyed enjoyment to Manchester musicians. Passing mention must be made of Dr. Watson's Vocal Society's introduction to Manchester of Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' and Gade's 'Christmas eve'; at Mr. Albert J. Cross's orchestral concert, Cyril Scott's 'Christmas' overture, Landon Ronald's 'Suite de ballet,' and MacDowell's second Piano-forte concerto were all brought to a first hearing in Manchester; and Paderewski was the only pianist who gave a recital during the month.

MUSIC IN NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

On November 24 the Postal Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' and showed much advance upon previous efforts. The orchestral score is a difficult one for a local orchestra, but under the skilful direction of Mr. E. L. Bainton a creditable reading was obtained. Miss Katherine Vincent and Messrs. Harold Wilde and Llewellyn Roberts were the solo vocalists.

At the second Harrison concert, on November 30, everything else was overshadowed by the incomparable lieder singing of Miss Elena Gerhardt: voice, intellect, and emotion were united to the one end, the interpretation of the composer's meaning.

On December 3, Berlioz's 'Faust' was revived by the Choral Union. Although only six rehearsals had been possible, on account of the Festival, a capital performance resulted. The mocking 'Amen' and 'Demon' choruses gave Dr. Coward opportunities for exhibiting startling tonal effects, and many of the dramatic portions were sung with great intensity. The Scottish Orchestra was engaged, and the soloists were Miss Emily Breare and Messrs. Alfred Heather, Charles Tree, and Llewellyn Roberts.

Two string quartet concerts have been given by the Chamber Music Society, the first by the St. Petersburg Quartet on November 26, and the second by the Sévick combination on December 14.

At the Newcastle Musical Society's concert on December 8, the most important features were César Franck's Violin sonata, finely played by Mr. A. Wall (violin) and Mr. E. L. Bainton (piano-forte), and Brahms's Horn trio, in which these artists were joined by M. Hervé (viola).

On November 30, the Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society gave a concert at which Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's wedding-feast' was performed. Schumann's Piano-forte concerto was played by Miss Ethel Page, of Newcastle, at two or three days' notice. Mr. T. Henderson conducted.

On December 7, Parry's 'Pied piper' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' received an excellent performance by the Durham Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. W. Ellis, sub-organist of the cathedral.

The Elswick Road Wesleyan Choir repeated Brahms's 'German' Requiem on December 5 (Mr. George Dodds), and on December 9 the Whitley Bay Choral Society sang Elgar's 'Light of life,' Bach's 'Praise the Lord,' and Franck's 150th Psalm, with an accompaniment of two pianofortes.

The Ladies' Glee and Madrigal Society gave a successful concert at Hexham on December 14. The choir showed skilful training by the conductor, Mr. John Walton, and sang part-songs and madrigals by Schubert, Rheinberger, Coleridge-Taylor, Brahms (with accompaniment for harp and horns), and Este.

MUSIC IN NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was given by the Norwich Philharmonic Society with the aid of the Norwich Choral Society, under the conductorship of Dr. Bates, at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on December 16. The solo vocalists were Madame Le Mar, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Albert Garcia. The band and chorus gave evidence of the careful training they had received under their esteemed conductor.

Some changes have been made in the executive of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Festival in consequence of the resignation by Sir Charles Gilman of the chairmanship of the committee of management, Mr. F. Oddin Taylor (honorary secretary for the last eighteen years) having been elected to the office of chairman, and Mr. Edmund Reeve to the office of honorary secretary in the place of Mr. Taylor.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Nottingham Orchestral Concerts gave their first performance on December 2. Berlioz's 'Hungarian' march from 'Faust,' Schubert's Symphony in C, and the 'Tannhäuser' overture are exacting works; and yet, with allowances for the inexperience of many of the performers, they were all well performed. The audience were evidently charmed by Elgar's suite (No. 2), 'Wand of Youth.' Mr. Robert Radford sang 'Qui s'degno' (Mozart) and 'Vulcan's song' (Gounod) very finely, and in response to an encore gave Gounod's 'Nazareth.'

The Mansfield Choral Union gave a remarkably fine performance of Handel's 'Samson' on December 7, under the direction of Mr. John Cullen. Choir and orchestra alike did excellent work, and the artists were Miss Gertrude Crisp, Miss E. Meggitt, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. W. Downing.

An attractive programme was provided by the Misses Baxter at their concert on December 9. Local talent of exceptional promise was exhibited alike in the singing of Miss Alice Baxter and the violin solos of Miss Hilda Baxter, and they were assisted by Mr. Francis Harford, and by Mr. Walter Wiltshire, who ably accompanied.

The Nottingham Glee and Madrigal Society, under Mr. C. E. Riley, gave an admirable concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust' on December 11, when the solos were very ably rendered by Miss Mary Lund, Miss Minnie Wall, Mr. Henry Turnpenney, Mr. James Coleman, Mr. Albert Farnsworth, and Mr. Albert Barras.

An interesting lecture on Mozart was given at the University College, on December 16, by Mr. T. Henderson, the illustrations being ably supplied by Miss Cantelo (pianoforte), Miss Hilda Baxter (violin) and Miss Bentley (vocalist).

The Beeston (Notts) Choral Society gave selections from the 'Hymn of Praise' and 'Elijah' and included 'Hear my prayer' in their programme of December 16. The solos were rendered by Miss Crisp, Mrs. West, Mrs. Wheatley, Mr. Lloyd Jones, and Mr. F. C. Taylor. Mr. Thums conducted.

'Hiawatha' (Coleridge-Taylor) was ably rendered on December 16 by the Gainsborough Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Montgomery. The solos were well rendered by Miss Lunn, Mr. Habbershaw, and Mr. Charles Knowles.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The first concert of this term took place in the Town Hall on October 16, when Mark Hambourg and his colleagues gave a very enjoyable concert, the pianist's chief items being Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 2, No. 3, not often heard, but beautifully played, and Chopin's Andante Spinto and Polonaise.

On October 21 in the same hall, under the auspices of the Musical Club, Mr. Leonard Borwick, Madame Marie Soldat and Mr. Percy Such gave a capital concert, Mr. Borwick's chief contribution being Schumann's delightful 'Etudes Symphoniques' (Op. 13).

On October 25, in the same building, Mr. Plunket Greene, with Sir Charles Stanford at the pianoforte, gave an enjoyable concert, consisting, however, exclusively of songs, though of various nationalities, of which 'The Fairy Lough' and 'Quick! We have but a second,' were very enthusiastically received.

On October 30, Mr. Arthur Newstead and party gave a concert in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall, this being the pianist's first visit to Oxford. He played admirably, amongst other pieces Beethoven's Sonata 'Appassionata' and Liszt's Rhapsody No. 15.

On November 12 in the Music Room, Holywell, and under the auspices of the Musical Union, Mr. Raymond Duncan lectured on 'Hellenic Music.' Mr. Duncan was most enthusiastic in his admiration of the old Greek music, but it was a little startling to be assured that if only we had kept to their simple style and not suffered ourselves to be led away by modern innovations and chromaticisms, we should have been as a nation so much more advanced all round that we should have had 'wireless telegraphy' a century ago! The illustrations were admirably rendered by Mrs. Duncan, who is, we understand, a Greek lady, and she is the fortunate possessor of a very charming voice.

On November 18 the Town Hall was packed to hear Paderewski, who played delightfully Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 27, No. 1) in E flat, Schumann's 'Fantasietücke' and Chopin's ever-welcome Scherzo in B flat minor.

On November 23, in the same hall, the Oxford Vocal Society, under the baton of Mr. H. B. Wilsdon, gave a very good rendering of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' the soloists being Miss Truscott, Miss Williams, Mr. Child and Mr. Greeves Johnson.

On November 25, in the Town Hall and under the auspices of the Musical Club, an orchestral concert was given, amongst the pieces performed being Debussy's beautiful Symphonic Prelude 'L'après-midi d'un faune,' and Elgar's famous Enigma Variations on an Original Theme, which it had been a labour of love to practise for some time under Dr. Allen's able direction, were admirably rendered and delighted everyone. We should mention that a short orchestral 'Fantasy' by a young musician, Mr. H. B. Gardiner, was also included, and about his work we may perhaps say more in course of time.

On November 30 Sir Walter Parratt, the Professor of Music, gave his terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre to an appreciative audience, the subject being 'Programme Music,' the illustrations to which were played on the pianoforte by Dr. Allen. The Professor lamented that second-rate composers much abused their art by introducing effects which were strained and unwarranted, under the idea of 'programme,' but said that Brahms was totally exonerated from this fault. Still, the Professor admitted that in the hands of a great composer, like Haydn for instance, the idea of 'programme music' had been often turned to great advantage.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Musical activity among the Wesleyan churches of the city has been greatly stimulated by the building in Sheffield of the handsome new Victoria Hall, a modern building capable of seating 2,000 persons. An affiliated choral body—the Victoria Hall Choral Society—has been formed in connection with the place, and under the leadership of Mr. H. C. Jackson is doing excellent work. During the winter well-studied performances of 'St. Paul' and the 'Hymn of Praise' have been given, in which spirited choral-singing has been a feature. In the same connection the musical discourses of the Rev. H. Giffard Oyston and some excellent Saturday popular concerts are all tending to a general advancement of music among the Wesleyans.

An orchestral pioneer effort has been launched during the past few weeks. A scheme of promenade concerts, organized by three well-known supporters of music in the city—Messrs. E. Willoughby Firth, T. Walter Hall and C. D. Leng, together with Mr. J. A. Rodgers as conductor and manager—came to fruition on November 18 and December 2, when the Albert Hall was filled with large audiences at popular prices. A capable local orchestra of sixty performers played Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 5 and 8 and Liszt's Pianoforte concerto in E flat, with Mr. Frederick Dawson as soloist; Handel's Organ concerto No. 4, with Mr. J. W. Phillips at the console; Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' overture; Elgar's Serenade for strings; Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien' and '1812' Overture, and pieces by Mackenzie, Wagner, Handel, &c. The reception of the venture was quite enthusiastic, and the concerts may come to be permanently established. Excellent assistance was given by Mr. Herbert Heyner and Miss Bessie Bowness (vocalists), and Mrs. Mountain (accompanist). Two more concerts are to be given in March.

The Hillsborough Wesleyan Choral Society earned high honour for a thoroughly competent performance of Bach's 'My spirit was in heaviness,' under Mr. F. Shimeld. At the second and third concerts of the Chamber Music Society the Klingler Quartet and the New Trio appeared, and an interesting pianoforte and vocal recital served to introduce to Sheffield the Misses Ivy and Valerie Parkin.

The Sheffield Musical Union's winter concert was designed on popular lines. Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' and Cliffe's 'Ode to the North-east wind' caught the fancy of both performers and audience. Choir and orchestra were in brilliant form, and Dr. Coward has rarely found his forces in better mood. The soloists were Miss Edith Evans, Miss Maria Yelland, Mr. Harold Wilde and Mr. Charles Tree. Mr. W. S. Jessop was at the organ and Mr. J. H. Parkes led the orchestra.

A picturesque performance of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was given on December 14 by the Amateur Musical Society. Mr. Henry J. Wood, who conducted, infused vitality into all the contrasted sections of the work. The singing of the choir was well balanced, alert, expressive and full of varied shades of tone. The orchestra was mainly local, carefully prepared by Mr. Wood, with principals from the Queen's Hall and Hallé Orchestras, and their finished playing was a feature of the concert. The soloists were Miss Amy Evans, Mr. Joseph Reed and Mr. Thorpe Bates. There was considerable enthusiasm at the close of the concert.

There were some interesting choral features at the December concert of the Amateur Instrumental Society. The choir of the Grand Opera Society assisted in a number of Wagner opera selections, among the excerpts admirably sung and played being the Apotheosis and final chorus of 'The Mastersingers,' and the Bridal processional music and Nuptial march from 'Lohengrin.' The orchestra gave a well-studied performance of Beethoven's 'Pastoral' symphony. All the works were directed by Mr. J. Duffell.

Another enjoyable amateur orchestral concert was given early in December by the Philharmonic Orchestra, the members of which played enthusiastically and well in Dvorák's 'New World' symphony, Mozart's 'Magic Flute' overture, and other works. The probationary branch of the same orchestra also gave a highly creditable concert, at which Haydn's 'London symphony' and Weber's 'Japanese war pictures' were the chief works played. Both concerts were conducted by Mr. J. H. Parkes.

A number of suburban and district societies have given anti-Christmas concerts, among the most notable being those of the Rotherham Choral Society (Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm—conductor, Mr. Thomas Brameld); the Heeley Musical Union (Coleridge-Taylor's 'Meg Blane'—Mr. Maurice Tomlinson); the Hillsborough Choral Society ('The Creation'—Mr. F. Shimeld); the Barnsley St. Cecilia Society ('Elijah'—Dr. Bairstow); and the Norton Lees Choral Society (Leon's 'The gate of life'—Mr. Arnold Bagshaw). Mention must also be made of a chorally successful performance of Handel's 'Samson' by the Sheffield Choral Union, conducted by Mr. H. Reynolds.

Some amateur operatic performances of Gounod's 'Faust,' by the Grand Opera Society (conductor, Mr. J. Duffell), and of 'Iolanthe,' by the Croft Hill Society, under Mr. Revell Slater, may also be noted among recent successful musical doings.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

LEEDS.

On November 30, the Leeds Philharmonic Society gave Stanford's oratorio 'Eden,' and the compliment implied was made all the more significant since they revived the work six years ago, with sufficient success to induce them to repeat it. In spite of all the changes in fashion which have occurred since 'Eden' was produced in Birmingham in 1891, it holds its own well, and the excellence of its libretto—which, it will be remembered, Mr. Robert Bridges based on a scenario left by Milton—combined with the thoughtful scholarship of the music, is still capable of producing a strong and distinguished impression. Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Blanche Tomlinson (a most promising young local soprano), Miss Dilys Jones, Messrs. Hyde, Jamieson Dodds and Plunket Greene formed a most able cast of soloists, and the choir sang with great refinement and beauty of tone. Sir Charles Stanford conducted. The Leeds Choral Union's performance of 'Elijah,' on December 15, with Miss D'Argo, Miss Miller, Messrs. Albert Watson and Thorpe Bates as soloists, under the conductorship of Dr. Coward, calls for no more than brief mention, as does the Philharmonic Society's 'Messiah,' under Mr. Fricker's direction, on December 22—one of a series of Christmas celebrations in the West Riding which are certainly 'too numerous to mention.' Two of the so-called 'Municipal' concerts call for notice. On December 4 a worthy performance of the 'Eroica' was given under Mr. Fricker, and it was satisfactory to observe the close and sustained attention which was paid to so long and serious a work by a 'popular' Saturday night audience. Mr. Ernest Farrar's orchestral rhapsody, 'The Open Road,' was an interesting feature of the concert; it showed a nice feeling for melody and a moving rhythm, and the orchestra is handled with ability. Mr. Alexander Cohen, a local violinist, attacked with much pluck the Canzonetta and Finale from Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, and Miss Laura Binns was the vocalist. The concert on December 18 was made the occasion of a little Haydn celebration, the programme including two of his symphonies, 'The Clock' and 'Farewell' (the latter with all the traditional 'effects'), and an overture in D. Miss Mabel Corbishley was the soloist in Chopin's 'Polonaise' (Op. 22) for pianoforte and orchestra, and a couple of Wagner pieces restored the equilibrium for those who might deem Haydn's music too old-fashioned to interest them. The Leeds Symphony Society, on December 13, gave a concert at which, under Mr. Grimshaw's direction, Gade's Symphony in F was the most important work in the programme, a graceful Suite by Delibes, 'La Source,' being a pleasing feature. Three Chamber Concerts, which have to be recorded, introduced some exceptionally interesting compositions. The Leeds Bohemian Quartet, on December 3, included in their programme a Haydn quartet, together with a novelty to Leeds in Maurice Ravel's Quartet in D. On December 6 Mr. Alexander Cohen gave a concert at which César Franck's early but highly-interesting Pianoforte trio in F sharp minor, and Arensky's better known Trio in D minor were artistically played, while on the 8th the Rasch Quartet introduced, along with Tchaikovsky's fine Quartet in E flat minor, Mr. Frank Bridge's 'Three Idylls,' rather sombre having regard to their title, but exceedingly well written, and rich in colour. Powerful performances were given of both works. Miss Elena Gerhardt made her first appearance at Leeds at a Harrison concert on December 1 (and at Bradford the following evening), and created a most favourable impression by her superb singing. Vocal recitals by Mr. J. Burley on November 24, Mr. Brearley on November 25, and a violin recital by Pecsai at one of the Leeds musical evenings, on December 14, call for mention.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Bradford Old Choral Society set a good precedent in making a departure from the traditional celebration of Christmas, by giving, on December 14, a portion of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio,' a work which deserves at least a share of the too exclusive attention paid to the 'Messiah' at this season. Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Harold Wilde and Mr. John Browning formed a cast of unusual ability, and the whole performance, which Mr. E. J. Pickles conducted, was of exceptional merit. The Permanent Orchestra's concert on December 11 was conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, who took the place of Mr. Allen Gill, and secured a really brilliant performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, a work which suits his powers perfectly. Nor was the orchestra heard to less advantage in the 'Ruy Blas' and Dvorák's 'Carneval' overtures, and indeed they have rarely appeared to more advantage. Miss E. Friedman was the violinist; and Mr. Brearley the vocalist. At the Subscription Concert on December 10, Madame Clara Butt, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, Mr. Catterall (a most artistic and finished violinist), and the pianist, Mr. Egon Petri, appeared in a miscellaneous programme which requires no detailed criticism.

The Hull Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. J. W. Hudson is the conductor, introduced into their programme on December 3, Schubert's fourth or 'Tragic' Symphony, of which a very creditable performance was given; and on December 9 the Hull Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Wallerstein, followed this by giving the same composer's fifth Symphony. Though it cannot be denied that these comparatively immature works are much outshone by the 'Unfinished' and the great C major, it is pleasant to be reminded of their existence, and to realise how Schubert built upon the precedent handed on to him by Haydn and Mozart. On the former occasion Miss Eldina Bligh played the solo part in Max Bruch's Violin concerto in G minor: on the latter, Bizet's second 'L'Arlésienne' suite was a pleasing feature in the programme. At the Symphony Orchestra's concert on November 24, it should be added, Dvorák's 'New world' symphony was played, but the performance hardly came up to the highest standard of the orchestra. On November 23 the Hull Vocal Society, of which Dr. G. H. Smith is the conductor, gave a miscellaneous programme, the choir being heard in unaccompanied part-music; and on December 8, Miss Guendolen Roe, a very young pianist, gave a recital which showed remarkable promise, her programme ranging from Bach to Reger, and including pieces which demand much more than mere digital dexterity.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concert on November 23 was supplied by Madame Clara Butt's party; that on December 14 was also of a miscellaneous character, a noteworthy feature being the performance of a lengthy scene from 'Samson and Delilah,' by Miss Lucy Nuttall and Mr. Walter Hyde. A very interesting programme of concerted vocal music was afforded at the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society's concert on December 7, the singing of madrigals by Wilbye and T. A. Walmisley, as well as of later glees and part-songs, being of much excellence. Mr. J. W. Armitage conducted.

The Morley Choral Society gave a welcome revival of Handel's 'Jephtha' on November 24, when the choir, under Mr. Fricker's direction, sang with great freshness and vigour, and Miss Blanche Tomlinson, Miss E. Ferguson, Mr. Mullings and Mr. Woodward were the soloists, the first three being young vocalists of exceptional promise. The Pudsey Choral Union also chose 'Jephtha' for their concert on November 29, when Mr. H. H. Pickard conducted a good all-round performance, the soloists being Madame Goodall, Miss Bradley and Messrs. Hempsall and Hayle. The Batley Choral Society departed from their customary routine on December 7, by undertaking the first performance outside London of Mr. Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean,' which went with capital vigour under Mr. Fearnley's conductorship, Miss Taggart and Mr. Herbert Parker being the soloists.

The Wakefield Chamber Concert on December 16 introduced Miss Gertrude Peppercorn as pianist, Mr. W. H. Squire as violoncellist, and Mr. Gordon Cleather as vocalist, in a programme of general interest. On December 6 the Scarborough Philharmonic Society, under Dr. Ely, gave a brilliant performance of Elgar's 'Black Knight,' and of some of his 'Bavarian Highlands' suite, the orchestra being heard in the 'Unfinished' symphony, and Mr. Albert Garcia contributing a number of songs. At York, Mr. John Groves gave one of his chamber concerts on November 26, when, with the assistance of Mr. W. H. Cass (violin) and Miss Groves (pianoforte), he introduced Arensky's Pianoforte trio in D minor, and Miss Grace Groves sang some poetical songs by Mr. Ernest Farrar, who accompanied them. The York Musical Society gave a miscellaneous concert on December 15, the choir singing some madrigals and an alla cappella anthem by their conductor, Mr. T. T. Noble, who also secured interesting performances of one of Elgar's 'Wand of youth' suites, and other orchestral pieces. On December 1 the Middlesbrough Musical Union, under Mr. Kilburn's conductorship, gave their first performance of the 'Faust' of Berlioz. Miss Ethel Lister, Mr. W. Mullins and Mr. Thorpe Bates were the principals in a generally satisfactory interpretation of the work.

The National Welsh Festival Choir will commence rehearsing at St. Benet's Welsh Church, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., on Thursday, January 13, at 8 p.m. The conductor will be Dr. A. Williams, and at the service on St. David's Eve, at St. Paul's Cathedral, the band of the Grenadiers will accompany the Choir.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

At the 138th Concert Populaire, M. Victor Vreuls conducted with considerable success several of his own highly interesting works, including the Symphony with solo violin, and the symphonic poem 'Jour de fête.'

BERLIN.

The Königliche Kapelle, conducted by Dr. Richard Strauss, played the 'Mirjam' Symphony, by Friedrich Gernsheim, at their third concert. The veteran composer (who is professor of composition at the Königliche Hochschule für Musik) was present and received a cordial ovation. A work of a more revolutionary character, Mahler's first Symphony, was heard at the fourth concert. This composition has many original touches and is, of course, wonderfully scored. On the same evening, the fiftieth anniversary of his death, Spohr's Notturmo (Op. 37) for solo wind instruments and orchestra was performed.—Bruckner's eighth Symphony was played by Josef Stransky at the head of the Blüthner Orchestra.—At the Philharmonic concerts, Professor Nikisch introduced Max Reger's 'Prologue to a Tragedy' and the new Symphony in E minor (Op. 27) by Rachmaninoff. The latter work was favourably received.—Another interesting Russian composition, 'Poème de l'Extase,' by Scriabine, was played at an orchestral concert given by the clever Russian conductor, Dr. Alexandre Chessin.—The Philharmonische Chor gave one of their now famous performances of Bach's great Mass in B minor, while the Singakademie devoted a concert to choral works by Brahms, including in the scheme the 'Song of Destiny' (Schicksalslied), 'Gesang der Parzen,' 'Nänie,' and the 'German Requiem.'—On December 3 the Komische Oper produced a new opera, 'Das Veilchenfest,' by the Dutch composer Jan Brandts-Buys.

BONN.

A new Symphony in D major by the young Hungarian composer, Erwin Lendvai, was produced with great success at the sixth concert of the municipal orchestra, under the conductorship of Herr Heinrich Sauer.

BRUSSELS.

Puccini's opera 'Madama Butterfly' was performed for the first time at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie. The work, of which an excellent performance was given, obtained the same great success here as everywhere.—At the first Ysaïe concert, two interesting novelties, Dubois's 'Symphonie Française' and 'Petite Suite' by Claude Debussy, were successfully produced. The programme also contained Brahms's second Pianoforte concerto in B flat, and César Franck's 'Les Djinns,' the pianoforte parts being played in a masterly manner by M. Raoul Pugno.—The second chamber-music concert given under the auspices of the Schola Musicae was devoted to compositions by M. Victor Vreuls. Among the works selected were a beautiful Sonata in B major for pianoforte and violin, and a pianoforte Trio.

CASSEL.

The fiftieth anniversary of the death of Spohr (who was for many years conductor at the Court Theatre) has been remembered in the programmes of the leading concerts. The Königliche Kapelle, conducted by Dr. Beier, gave his Symphony in C minor, while the Sextet for strings was performed at a chamber-music concert. At another concert of the Königliche Kapelle, Bruckner's fourth Symphony was heard for the first time. No other work by this composer has ever before been given in Cassel.

COLOGNE.

The programmes of the Gürzenich Concerts have been very interesting. At the second concert Granville Bantock's overture 'The Pierrot of the Minute' made a very favourable impression, while at the third concert Spohr was remembered by a performance of his beautiful Concerto in B minor for two violins. Friedrich E. Koch's oratorio 'Die Stundflut' was produced at the fourth concert. The work (for which the composer himself has arranged the text) had the advantage of an almost perfect performance under the direction of Herr Steinbach, in whose hands it proved very impressive. —At the Musikalische Gesellschaft there was an interesting revival of Spohr's seventh Symphony, 'Irdisches und Göttliches im Menschenleben,' for double orchestra.

COBURG.

Eugen d'Albert's new opera 'Yzeyl' had a cordial reception on its first performance at the Court Theatre.

COPENHAGEN.

The Dansk Koncertforening, a Society which enjoys an annual grant from the Danish Government, and whose aim is to perform new or undeservedly neglected native music, gave its first concert of the season in the beginning of December. Roger Henriksen's 'Sanct Hans Hymne,' for solo voice, double vocal quartet, chorus and orchestra, and an orchestral piece 'Drapa,' by Rudolf Immanuel Langgaard, figured as novelties in the programme, which also contained Gade's Symphony in B minor (No. 8) and a choral composition, 'Bjergfrigen,' by the recently deceased composer Leopold Rosenfeld.

CRACOW.

At the first subscription concert of the Musikalische Gesellschaft, the C minor Symphony by Brahms was performed for the first time in Cracow. The work caused the greatest enthusiasm. Sibelius's symphonic poem 'En Säg' was also in the programme.

DRESDEN.

The Royal Opera has given interesting revivals of Rubinstein's fantastic opera 'Der Dämon,' and Verdi's 'Maskenball' (Un ballo in maschera). Two novelties for Dresden, Puccini's 'Madama Butterfly' and Enrico Bossi's lyrical opera 'Der Wanderer,' were also presented. —Under the auspices of the Internationale Musikgesellschaft, the 'Christmas oratorio,' by Heinrich Schütz, was performed by the Kreuzchor for the first time on December 9. The work, originally composed in 1664 for the Kgl. Kapelle, was considered lost until last year, when Dr. Arnold Schering, of Leipzig, found the composition in the library of the University of Upsala (Sweden). —The Mozart Verein paid homage to the name of Spohr by performing his Concerto for string quartet and orchestra, Op. 131, while his Symphony in C minor figured on the programme of a symphony concert given by the Königliche Kapelle. On the same occasion Fritz Volbach's Symphony in B minor, Op. 33, performed for the first time in Dresden, met with great success.

DUISBURG.

At a meeting of the Bach Society held in Leipzig, it has been decided that the fifth Bach festival is to be held here from June 7 to 10, 1910.

ELBERFELD.

Handel's rarely heard oratorio 'Samson' was excellently performed at the first concert of the Elberfelder Konzertgesellschaft. —At the municipal theatre, Max Schilling's opera 'Ingelwede' was revived. The composer, who conducted his own work, received a great ovation.

THE HAGUE.

The violoncellist van Isterdaël is giving four historical recitals to illustrate the development of the Violoncello sonata. The programme of the first consisted of sonatas by Bach, Brahms, and Sir Charles Stanford.

HAMBURG.

At the second Philharmonic concert, the conductor, Professor Karl Panzner, obtained an excellent rendering of Felix Woyrsch's Symphony in C minor. —The Bohemian Quartet introduced Max Reger's new Quartet in E flat, Op. 109. They also played Verdi's rarely heard but beautiful Quartet in E minor.

HANOVER.

Goldmark's effective opera 'Göz von Berlichingen' had its first performance at the Royal Theatre. —An orchestral serenade by Percy Sherwood was successfully produced at the third concert of the Royal Orchestra.

LEIPSIK.

Verdi's delightful comic opera 'Falstaff' has been revived after an interval of fifteen years. On December 5, Pfitzner's interesting though rather Wagnerian opera 'Der arme Heinrich' had its first Leipzig production. Choral works have been much in evidence lately. Bach's Grand Mass in B minor and Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' were heard at the Bachverein and Riedelverein respectively, while Haydn's 'Seasons' delighted the audience of the Gewandhaus concerts. The symphonic poem 'Hero and Leander,' by Paul Ertel, had a good reception at the second Philharmonic concert, while at the third, Berlioz's dramatic symphony 'Romeo and Juliet' was heard for the first time in its entirety. —Max Reger's music has also been much to the fore. His new motet 'Mein Odem ist schwach' was produced by the Thomanerchor, and on other occasions his 'Gesang der Verklärten,' the new String quartet and the Violin concerto, Op. 101, have been heard. —Several interesting chamber music works, including Fauré's Pianoforte quartet, Violin sonatas by Hugo Kaun (Op. 82, new) and Busoni (Op. 36a), and a Sonata à tre by the old English composer William Boyce (1717-1779) were also performed.

MUNICH.

A small one-act opera buffa 'Susannes Geheimnis' (Il segreto di Susanna), by Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari, had a great success on its production at the Court Theatre. The work is full of grace and natural melodic beauty, and the scoring combines the transparent clearness of the old opera buffa with the modern harmonic and orchestral effects. —Bruckner's gigantic ninth Symphony was in the programme of the first subscription concert of the Konzertverein (conductor Ferdinand Löwe). At the Volkssymphoniekonzerte, Spohr's symphony 'Die Weihe der Töne,' and two early compositions by Richard Strauss, Serenade for wind instruments, and the Violin concerto (excellently played by Herr Erhard Heyde), were given.

NEUSS.

Liszt's oratorio 'Die heilige Elisabeth' received an impressive rendering under the conductorship of Herr Helmich.

NIJMEGEN.

Elgar's 'The Apostles' was performed by the Maatschappij tot bevordering der Toonkunst, on December 17, under the direction of Heer W. Kerper.

PARIS.

On November 17, Wagner's 'Ringgold' was performed for the first time at the Opéra. Contrary to the master's directions, the work was given with an interval of half an hour between the third and fourth scenes. The performance under the baton of M. Messager was excellent, M. van Dyck in particular distinguishing himself in the part of Loge. —The young composer Jean Nougues was responsible for two operas, 'Quo Vadis' (the text of which is adapted from Sienkiewicz's novel) and 'Chiquito' (after Pierre Loti's 'Ramuntcho'), successfully performed at the Théâtre Lyrique de la Gaité, and the Opéra Comique. The latter institution also produced, on December 8, two novelties, 'Myrtil,' by Ernest Garnier, and 'Le Cœur du Moulin,' by Déodat de Séverac. —The interesting 'Symphonie sur un chant montagnard,' by Vincent d'Indy, was performed at the Colonne Concerts with M. Raoul Pugno as an admirable interpreter of the obligato pianoforte part.

ROME.

It is a sign of the growing appreciation of symphony music in Italy that a three days' Beethoven Festival has taken place, at which the composer Signor Sgambati appeared as pianist in the 'Emperor' concerto, and was enthusiastically applauded. —On November 26, the 'Società internazionale per la musica da camera' gave a concert devoted entirely to instrumental compositions by J. S. Bach.

STRASSBURG.

'Ariadne,' a mythical mystery play, by Ludwig Hess, was produced successfully under the conductorship of Herr Pfitzner. The work is said to show considerable talent.

The performances of the Festival week at Munich, in honour of Richard Strauss, have been arranged as follows: Three theatrical performances to be given by the royal General-intendant in the Munich Prinzregenten Theater—'Feuersnot' (June 23), 'Salome' (June 24), 'Elektra' (June 26), under the direction of Richard Strauss and Felix Mottl. Three symphony concerts, in the newly-built Music Hall of the Munich Exhibition (seating 3,000), on June 25, 27 and 28. The Philharmoniker of Vienna (from the Imperial Opera) will take part at these concerts, under the direction of Generalmusikdirektor Ernst von Schuch (Dresden) and Richard Strauss himself. Finally, two matinees of songs and chamber music will take place on June 24 and 26, in the Munich Künstler-Theater. Full information with respect to the festival may be obtained at the central office, Konzert-Bureau Emil Gutmann, Munich.

The Edinburgh Musical Education Society made the experiment on Friday evening, December 10, of giving a concert for girls and boys. The University music classroom, which holds about 500, was quite full, and the young people proved themselves a most attentive and appreciative audience. The performers were Miss Agnes Johnston, Mus. Bac., Miss Gordon McKenzie, and Mr. Dace (pianists), Miss Eugenie Bach (vocalist), and Mr. Colin McKenzie (violinist). A special feature of the concert was that Professor Niecks, President of the Society, prefaced each number by a few explanatory remarks.

The judges in the Music Competition announced by Dr. Charles Harriss last summer, in connection with the next Empire Day Concert, are to be Sir Frederick Bridge, Mr. Allen Gill and Mr. Hamilton Harty. The prizes offered are £50, £30, and £20 for the three best short works for voices and orchestra. The successful compositions are to be performed at the Empire Concert under Dr. Harriss's direction. The rules were advertised in our issue for August last.

During the last month the pupils of the Royal College of Music have come before the public at two concerts, given on December 8 (chamber) and December 14 (orchestral). A Sonata in G major for violin and pianoforte by Mr. Eric W. Gritton was the only composition by a student included in the programmes, which for the rest consisted of familiar music. The orchestra was conducted by Sir Charles Stanford.

The Novello Choir of eighty voices gave a miscellaneous concert to the inmates of St. George's Workhouse, Fulham Road, on December 7. The audience numbered about 1,000 men and women, and the entertainment afforded them obvious pleasure. Dr. McNaught conducted, Mr. Philip Cathie played violin solos, and several members of the choir sang songs. Mr. Harold L. Brooke accompanied.

Messrs. Challen & Son had the honour of a visit from the King of Portugal, at their show-rooms in Hanover Street, during his stay in London, when His Majesty was pleased to select one of Messrs. Challen & Son's new short grands, which he commanded to be sent to Lisbon. His Majesty afterwards accorded a special audience to Mr. C. H. Challen at Buckingham Palace.

Mr. W. J. Riley, the recently-appointed secretary of the Philharmonic Society, Liverpool, has been the recipient of a silver tea-service from the ladies of the choir. The gentlemen had already given him a clock to mark his twenty-fifth year of service.

A concert was given by the students' orchestra of the Guildhall School of Music at the City of London School, on December 15, when Schubert's Symphony No. 7, and Wieniawski's Concerto No. 2, were the chief works performed. Miss Audrey Richardson showed great promise as a violinist. The Principal, Dr. W. H. Cummings, conducted.

The London Sunday School Choir will hold their spring festival at the Royal Albert Hall, South Kensington, on Saturday, February 19, 1910, and their next great Crystal Palace festival on Wednesday, June 15, 1910.

At Sotheby's sale on December 17, twenty-four autograph letters by Beethoven were sold for £660 and an autograph score of Elgar's overture 'Cockaigne' for £24.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ACCRINGTON.—The Choral Society gave its first concert this season on December 1, when Prout's cantata 'Hereward' was performed, the choir displaying good attack and expression. The solo parts were sung by Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Edith Clegg and Mr. Frederick Ranaflow, who successfully replaced at short notice Mr. Robert Radford. Mr. W. S. Walker conducted.

BLACKBURN.—The first concert this season of the Ladies' Choir was given in the Town Hall on December 15, under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Duckworth. The choir again evinced most careful training and gave effective renderings of the chorus, 'The rose is fairest' (F. Davidson), part-songs, 'Where is the nymph?' (Christie Green)—first performance—'Over hill, over dale' (Beach), 'Love is a broken lily' (Harris), 'Sorrows of Werther' (Wolstenholme)—first performance—'Ye banks an' braes' (Bantock), and von Holst's eight-part motet 'Ave Maria.' The soloists were Miss Margaret Walker, Mr. Charles Critchley, Mr. Simon Speelman (viola), and Mr. R. J. Forbes (pianoforte).

BRIDGWATER.—Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' received adequate interpretation on November 25 by the members of the Amateur Choral Society, supported by an excellent orchestra (led by Mr. Edgar Wood), under the able direction of Mr. Frank Dockey. The solo parts were sung by Miss Alice Baxter, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Henry Turnpenney, and Mr. Arthur Trowbridge.

BRIGHTON.—The Sacred Harmonic Society's second subscription concert took place in the Dome on December 9, when Costa's 'Eli' was performed. The choir displayed good tone and excellent expression, and received efficient support from the orchestra. The solo vocalists were Miss Dorothy Kennard, Miss Clara Robson, Mr. Charles Saunders, Mr. Herbert Puttick, and Mr. Montague Borwell. Mr. Robert Taylor was as usual a skilful conductor.

BUCKHURST HILL.—The Choral Society gave a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust' on December 15. The choruses were all sung well, especially the Kermesse Scene. The soloists were Miss Eleanor Felix, Miss Hope Jackson, Mr. Alexander Webster, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop. Miss Madge Taylor accompanied, and Mr. E. J. Woods presided at the organ. Mr. Otley Marshall conducted.

CARDIFF.—The Harmonic Society opened their season at the Park Hall, Cardiff, on December 1. The first part of the programme consisted of Mr. Harry Evans's new dramatic cantata 'Dafydd ap Gwilym.' The choir, orchestra and artists gave an excellent performance, conducted by the composer. The solo vocalists were Misses Leah Felissa and Lily Fearney, and Messrs. David Ellis and Wilfred Douthitt. In the second part Miss Marie Novello played Liszt's 'Rhapsodie Hongroise' very effectively, and the concert concluded with an efficient rendering of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha,' conducted by Mr. Roderick Williams.

CHELMSFORD.—The Musical Society gave the first concert of the season on December 14 at the Corn Exchange. The principal work was Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Callirhoe,' which was conducted by the composer. At the close of the performance Sir Frederick expressed his pleasure at the interpretation of his work, which reflected great credit upon the conductor of the Society, Mr. F. R. Frye. The soloists were Miss Mary Lund, Madame Amy Newton and Mr. Gwilym Richards.

CHICHESTER.—Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was admirably performed by the Cathedral Oratorio Society on December 9, in the Cathedral, under the conductorship of Mr. F. J. W. Crowe. The choir and orchestra numbered 230 performers, and the principal parts were sung by Masters Leslie Battenby and Challen, Messrs. R. Heaps, Robert Marley, W. H. Whiteside and Reginald Stewart. Mr. E. Stephenson organist of Birmingham Cathedral, presided at the organ.

CINDERFORD.—The Choral Society gave a concert in the Town Hall on December 9, when the chief feature of the programme consisted of Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen,' which was accompanied by an efficient orchestra. The solo vocalists were Madame Florence Thomas, Miss L. Cooke, Mr. Jesse Hackett, and Mr. Wallace Taylor. Mr. George Kear conducted.

CRANLEIGH.—The Christmas school concert took place on December 8, when the principal feature of the programme was Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's departure,' which received a very fair rendering by the school choir, the solos being taken by P. H. Briscoe, Mr. W. F. Herbert and Mr. R. McD. Winder. Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Luigini's 'Ballet Egyptien' were also performed. Mr. W. A. Boxall was the leader of a small but efficient orchestra, mostly amateur. Mr. R. Harris conducted.

CROYDON.—A concert was given in the Public Hall on December 3 by the string orchestra of the Croydon Conservatoire of Music, under the able conductorship of Mr. William H. Reed. The programme comprised Bach's Suite in D, Elgar's Serenade for strings (Op. 20), Jensen's Serenade for string orchestra (Op. 37), and the conductor's recently published Suite for string orchestra. The last-named, an exceedingly melodious and attractive work, and well played under the composer's direction, met with warm approval. Two students—Miss Olive Hyslop and Mr. Edward J. Shakespeare—contributed vocal and pianoforte solos, and Mrs. Eleanor Davis accompanied. These concerts are given each term, and on the occasion under notice a high standard of performance was reached.

DOVERCOURT.—A concert-performance of a selection from Gounod's 'Faust' was given by the Harwich and Dovercourt Choral Society in the Alexandra Hall on December 8. The choir had evidently been trained with much care by the conductor, Mr. R. L. Gooch, and received efficient assistance from the orchestra, who also played Mendelssohn's 'Athalia' Overture.

EAST GRINSTEAD.—The Orchestral Society gave a concert in the Parish Hall on December 8, under the conductorship of Mr. Noel E. Hope. The programme included Schubert's Symphony No. 5 in B flat and Marche militaire, Suppé's overture 'Poet and Peasant,' and the Ballet-music from Gounod's 'Faust.' These works received a capable performance. The solo vocalists were Miss Florence Wilcox and Mr. William Waite, and Miss Avice Sealey was the solo violinist.

EASTBOURNE.—Mr. Henry Davey gave an interesting lecture in the Town Hall on December 2, on the subject of Wagner and the Bayreuth performances. The musical illustrations were supplied by Miss Mina Hudson's pupils and a choir of fifty voices, and included the Spinning Chorus ('Flying Dutchman'), Pilgrims' Chorus ('Tannhäuser'), Bridal Chorus ('Lohengrin'), and several solos.—The Eastbourne Choral and Orchestral Society opened their season on December 11 with a concert in the Town Hall, when Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' formed the main feature. Miss Mildred Guthrie was the soloist. In the second part of the programme Elgar's delightful 'Spanish Serenade' received an adequate rendering at the hands of choir and orchestra, and the latter were heard in Weber's 'Freischütz' overture, and the 'Peer Gynt' suite of Grieg. Dr. Hamand conducted.

ELTHAM.—The Choral and Orchestral Society opened its season on December 13, at Holy Trinity Parish Hall, with Romberg's 'Lay of the Bell' and Stanford's 'Revenge.' Credit is due to the conductor, Mr. B. J. Hancock, for the excellence of the performance. The solo vocalists were Miss Fanny Goldsborough, Mr. Alfred Pinnington, and Mr. Harry Evans.

HIGH WYCOMBE.—A very successful performance of Parts I. and II. of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was given in the Town Hall on December 1, by the Choral Association. The soloists were Miss Cecile Whitefield, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Robin Overleigh. Herr Ernst Groell led the orchestra, Mr. C. H. Collins presided at the organ, and Mr. George F. Andrews conducted.

HOUNSLOW.—The Heston-Isleworth Orchestral and Choral Society gave a concert in the Public Baths at Hounslow on November 29, when Cowen's 'St. John's Eve' was excellently performed. The solo vocalists were Miss Maud Hardy, Miss Flavell Law, Mr. Hugh Williams and Mr. Sidney Ashton. The orchestra was led by Miss Lesline Perks, and the work was conducted by Mr. E. Roland Barkley.

ILFORD.—The Orchestral and Choral Society gave a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust' in the Town Hall on November 24. Both choir and orchestra did excellent work, reflecting much credit on the conductor, Mr. H. A. Donald, and the solo parts were sung by Miss Kate Foley, Madame Ethel Dyer, Messrs. Robert Curtis, Harold Pattison, Frank Dewhurst, and William Waite, who was specially successful as Mephistopheles.—A concert-lecture on Mendelssohn was given in the Congregational Church on November 22 by Mr. Walter J. Walls, when vocal illustrations were supplied by Miss Louie Watson, Master Henry Lewis, Mr. Bernard Gawthrop and Mr. Robert Fisher, and the choir sang a selection of anthems and choruses.

INVERCARGILL (N.Z.).—The Musical Union opened their season in the Municipal Theatre on October 29 with an interesting programme, which included Dudley Buck's 'Ode to music,' Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' part-songs by Roland Rogers, Brahms, and Hamish MacCunn, and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast.' These works were well performed under the conductorship of Mr. C. Gray. Mr. C. C. Cook was the soloist in Coleridge-Taylor's cantata.

LEAMINGTON SPA.—A good performance of 'Elijah' was given on November 30 by the Leamington Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. H. W. J. Gibbon. Mr. Herbert Parker gave a dramatic rendering of the Prophet's part, and the other principal parts were capably sustained by Miss Alice Hare, Miss Hannah Jones and Mr. Sam Hemsall.

LETCHEWORTH.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' in the Pinxmore Institute on December 1, under the direction of Mr. H. Gomersall. The choir and orchestra numbered eighty performers, and the solo vocalists were Miss Mary Lund, Mrs. Leslie King, Mr. Harry Collins and Mr. R. L. Morris.

LINCOLN.—The Musical Society are to be congratulated upon the first concert of their fourteenth season, given at the Corn Exchange on December 1, when Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night' and the new concert selection from Gounod's 'Faust' were successfully performed. The choir, numbering nearly 200 voices, sang excellently, and the first word should be of congratulation to them and their able conductor, Dr. G. J. Bennett, upon the admirable tone and finish of their work. The soloists were Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Lloyd Chandos and Mr. Charles Tree. The orchestra (led by Mr. Edward O'Brien), which included thirty players from the London Symphony Orchestra, was highly efficient in both works, as well as in the 'Overture to a Drama,' by Dr. Adolf Sandberger. The last-named, which was performed for the first time in England, proved to be characterised by melodic charm and clever orchestration, and was finely interpreted by the orchestra, under Dr. Bennett's skilful direction.—The Lincoln College of Music gave a concert in the County Assembly Rooms on December 3, when the students had the valuable assistance of Madame Marie Duma, Herr Heinrich Dittmar (violin), Miss Gertrude Foster (pianoforte), and Mr. H. S. Trevitt (accompanist).

LONDON DERRY.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' in St. Columb's Hall on December 10. Congratulations are due to the conductor, Mr. A. J. Cunningham, for his excellent training of the choir, and the orchestra also gave very efficient support. The solo vocalists were Miss Boyd Steven, Miss Ethel Strangways, Mr. James Hay and Mr. Alfred Kaufmann.

MALVERN.—The programme of the Choral Union's concert on December 16, included as its main feature Elgar's 'Banner of St. George.' The orchestra and choir gave an excellent performance of the work, the part of Sabra being well sung by Miss Muriel Godwin. Mozart's 'Jupiter' symphony and Elgar's 'Three characteristic pieces' for orchestra (Op. 10) were also played, whilst an additional local interest was given to the occasion by the performance of 'Abendlied,' a setting for chorus and orchestra, by the conductor, Mr. F. W. Wadely, of verses by the Vicar of Malvern.

MONTON.—The first concert of the season by the Choral Society was given in Eccles, on November 24, when 'Acis and Galatea' and 'The Gate of Life' (Franco Leoni) were performed. The choruses were well sung under the direction of Mr. Herbert S. Rowley, and the principal vocalists were Madame Annie Walker, Mr. Joseph Cheetham and Mr. Bridge Peters. An efficient orchestra was led by Mr. Speelman.

NAYLAND.—The programme of the Choral Society's first concert of its present season on December 15, included part-songs, old English airs (harmonized) and carols, which were well sung by the choir. Mr. F. R. Frye conducted, and Miss Johnson was the accompanist.

NEWPORT.—The Choral Society gave its first concert of the fourteenth season at the Central Hall on December 2, when Part I. of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was given by a choir and orchestra of over 200 performers, in a manner deserving of high commendation. The second part of the programme included Sibelius's tone-poem, 'Finlandia,' given for the first time in Newport. Miss Esta d'Argo, Mrs. W. G. Stokes, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Dan Price were the soloists, and Mr. Arthur Sims conducted with much skill and judgment.

NORTHFLEET.—The Northfleet and District Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The flag of England' in the Factory Hall on December 15. The solo vocalists were Miss Euneta Truscott and Mr. Gwilym Richards respectively. Mr. Horace R. Shirley conducted.

PENRITH.—A concert was given by the Musical Society in the Drill Hall on December 9, when the programme included the first part of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' In this the choir sang with notable success, and the work of the orchestra was also admirable. The principal solo vocalists were Miss Margaret Hadfield, Mr. Joseph Cheetham and Mr. Albert Archdeacon. The second part included Weber's overture 'Der Freischütz,' Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' Elgar's part-songs 'The snow' and 'Fly, singing bird,' and a setting of Southey's words 'To a bee,' by the Rev. T. W. Stephenson (conducted by the composer), which was well received. Mr. E. Godfrey Brown was the able conductor. A two-days' festival is arranged for next year.

PETWORTH.—The Choral Society performed Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' on December 8, under the direction of Mr. Selve Fowles, the solo vocalists being Miss J. A. P. Wyatt, Miss E. G. P. Wyatt, Mr. Henry Beaumont and the Rev. J. T. Penrose.

READING.—The Philharmonic Society performed Parry's oratorio 'Judith' in the Town Hall, on December 8. This fine work, which had not before been heard in Reading, received a very capable interpretation by the choir and orchestra (led by Mr. Alfred Burnett) under the skilful direction of Dr. F. J. Read, whose training of the choir deserves special recognition. The solo vocalists were Madame Anna Shergold, Miss Joan Ashley, Mr. James Ashley, Mr. James Davis, and Mr. Paul Edmonds.

RUGBY.—The Philharmonic Society gave a fine performance of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' in the New Speech Room on November 25, under the conductorship of Mr. Basil Johnson. The singing of the choir throughout was admirable, and gave great promise of future good work. There was a professional orchestra, and the solo vocalists were Miss Euneta Truscott, Miss Grace Day Winter, Mr. Alfred Heath and Mr. Watkin Mills. It is intended to perform the 'Dream of Gerontius' in March.

SOUTHEND.—Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was performed by the Choral Society at the Kursaal on November 30. The choir sang well, and received adequate assistance from the orchestra. Miss Alice Motterway, Miss Howard French, Mr. Philip Ritte, Mr. M. Macfarlane, and Mr. Thomas Rainger sang the solo parts, and Mr. Whiteman conducted.

SOUTHPORT.—The Choral Society gave their opening concert of the season on December 3. The programme included the overtures to 'Rienzi' and 'Die Meistersinger,' the third act of the 'Flying Dutchman,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Nero' suite (last movement) and the 'Bon-Bon' choral suite, the last-named, conducted by the composer, meeting with the hearty appreciation of the audience. The solo part was finely sung by Mr. Lewys James. The other soloists were Madame Sadler Fogg, who was heard in Liszt's 'Loreley,' and Mr. Frank Mullings, who sang the 'Preislied.' Mr. J. C. Clark, the Society's conductor, is to be congratulated on the highly satisfactory results of his capable efforts in training his resources.

STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.—Sir Frederick Bridge's cantata 'The Cradle of Christ' was performed by the Choral Society on November 30, under the conductorship of the composer. The choir had been well trained by Mr. Guernsey Webb, the Society's conductor, and the orchestra gave efficient support. The solo parts were sung by Miss Francesca Hall and Mr. Graham Smart.

STIRLING.—Elgar's 'King Olaf' was successfully performed by the Choral Society on December 10, under the able conductorship of Dr. A. W. Marchant, to whom much credit is due. Mr. W. H. Cole's orchestra assisted, and the solo vocalists were Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Samuel Masters and Mr. Charles Knowles. Elgar's Imperial March preceded the cantata.

TAUNTON.—The first concert this season by the Choral Society took place in the London Assembly Rooms on November 30, when the concert-selection from Gounod's 'Faust,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon' choral suite were the main features of attraction. The choir was heard to great advantage in both works, and received efficient support from the orchestra, the latter also giving a very able rendering of Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture and the 'Casse Noisette' Suite. The solo parts were interpreted by Miss Edith Kirkwood, Mr. James Davis and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. Reginald Ward was a skilful conductor.

TEIGNMOUTH.—At the Church House, East Teignmouth, on November 23, an interesting presentation was made to Miss Charlotte E. Linter, to commemorate the hundredth year of the connection of her family with the services in the Parish Church. Miss Linter's father, Mr. William Linter, became organist of the church in 1809: he was followed by his son, Dr. Edwin Linter, who was in turn succeeded by his sister, the present organist. The occasion was undoubtedly unique, and the presentation, which was made by the vicar, consisted of an illuminated address and a purse of 130 sovereigns.

TREALAW.—The Orpheus Glee Society gave a concert in the Judges' Hall on November 24, under the conductorship of Mr. Emrys Richards, when the chief feature of the evening was David's 'The Desert.' This was admirably rendered by the choir. There was a small select orchestra, and the solo vocalists were Miss Carrie Jones, Mr. Thomas Thomas, Mr. R. O. Jones, and Mr. Willie Richards, with Mr. J. H. Davies as reader.

WALTON-ON-THAMES.—Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' was the pièce de résistance at the Choral Society's concert on December 7. This work received a capable performance under the direction of Mr. H. T. Gilberthorpe, the solo being sung by Miss Flora Mann. The other soloists were Mr. Wallace Jones and Mr. Alexander Bristowe.

WEMBLEY.—The Choral Society performed the concert version of German's opera 'Merrie England,' on December 13, under the direction of Mr. Charles Gardiner. The singing of the choir was worthy of much praise and gave evidence of the care with which they had been trained. The principal vocalists were Miss Lily Gover and Mr. Edwin Evans, while Miss Phyllis Finch, Miss Florence Holderness and Mr. Joseph Boddy contributed to the success of the performance. The orchestra did not succeed in disguising its inexperience.

WOKING.—The Musical Society opened its season at the Public Hall on December 8 with a performance of MacCunn's 'The wreck of the Hesperus' and Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' both of which received adequate rendering by the choir and orchestra (led by Mr. T. E. Gatehouse), which reflected credit on the conductor, Mr. Patrick White. Miss Ada Forrest and Mr. I. R. Abrahams were the solo vocalists, and Mr. Alfred Wright was solo pianist.

Answers to Correspondents.

TARIFF REFORMER.—The air known as 'Lilbullero' is an adaptation of the quick step of a march composed by Henry Purcell. The original was first printed in 1686. The words which were added are said to have contributed to the Revolution of 1688. They refer to King James's nomination of the Earl of Tyrconnel to the Lieutenancy of Ireland. But the whole story is too long to tell here. See Grove's Dictionary and Chappell's 'Popular music of the olden time.'

J. P. H.—Free translations of the directions you quote from Garcia's 'Hints on Singing' are as follows: 'Chi sa respirare sa cantare' (Who breathes well sings well); 'Chi dura vince' (Who endures will conquer); 'Le recitativo est la page que le chanteur signe' (The recitative is the sign-manual of the singer).

A READER.—You ask whether the date of Chopin's birth was 1909 or 1910. It was neither. He was born on March 1, 1809, although his tombstone says 1810. 'La ci darem la mano' is the title of a celebrated duet in Mozart's 'Don Giovanni,' and may be freely translated as 'Give me thy hand.'

M. D. C. wishes to trace a song called 'Guy Fawkes,' which he believes was sung by Albert Smith, and had some vogue at the tea-gardens in the middle of the last century. Do any readers know of the song?

J. A. C.—You do not say what else you know besides the pieces named. It is most probable that your best course will be to practise the technical studies in Stainer's 'Organ Music,' in Novello's Primer series.

R. I. A.—It is impossible for us to say whether your vocal cords are injured. They may be only temporarily impeded by your nasal catarrh. If this continues, you should consult a surgical specialist. We do not recommend names.

A. S. KENYON.—We are sorry we cannot trace the publisher of the Suite in four movements for organ or harpsichord by William Shield.

Other answers are unavoidably postponed.

THE MUSICAL EDUCATOR.

A LIBRARY OF INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC

WRITTEN BY EXPERTS.

FIRST PAYMENT, 1s. 6d.

The aim of "The Musical Educator" is to supply in compact and interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

MARK HAMBOURG, "The Piano and how to Play it."

EDWIN H. LEMARE, "The Art of Organ Playing."

MADAME MARCHESI, "The Teaching of Singing."

JOHN DUNN, "On Playing the Violin."

DR. F. H. COWEN, "The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In the "Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that the "Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE

"The 'Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRESER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader."

... It contains excellent instructions."

FOR USE WITH

HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN

OR ANY OTHER CHURCH HYMNAL.

272 pages, Imperial 16mo. Cloth Boards, price Three Shillings and Sixpence.

Tonic Sol-fa Edition Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Hymns only, Imperial 32mo, Cloth Boards, One Shilling.

Hymns only, medium 32mo, diamond type, cloth, 4d.; paper, 3d.

Complete edition, bound with HYMNS ANCIENT AND MODERN (Quarto), 7s. 6d. net.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.

For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 301, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

THE ORCHESTRAL INSTRUMENTS AND WHAT THEY DO

A PRIMER FOR CONCERT-GOERS

BY

DANIEL GREGORY MASON.

WITH 27 ILLUSTRATIONS AND ORCHESTRAL CHART, • Cloth, Five Shillings.

A popular elementary primer on orchestration has long been needed.
This capital little book, written in a clear and interesting style, lightens up a subject generally considered rather forbidding in its difficulty. It will appeal to those who wish to increase their grasp and appreciation of orchestral music; while for the student no better book could be wished as an introduction to this branch of study. It will find a place as a textbook in school and conservatory.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF
LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . Worthy the study of choral societies of every grade."—Norfolk Staffordshire Sentinel.
"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pentypool Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE TEN VIRGINS A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"The choral writing in 'The Ten Virgins' is alone something to be thankful for, and, as we have intimated, it is only one of the many musical virtues of the Cantata."—Leamington Chronicle.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to enquire every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works, is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—The Musical Times.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

JOAN OF ARC AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Ekeater Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each 1s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

THE MAID OF ASTOLAT

SYMPHONIC POEM FOR ORCHESTRA

COMPOSED BY

J. D. DAVIS.
(Op. 37.)

STRING PARTS (in the Press).

WIND PARTS AND FULL SCORE, MS.

THE TIMES.

A charmingly expressive musical picture of Elaine, called "The Maid of Astolat," with much beauty, warmth of orchestral colour and organic interest of no slight order.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Davis's music is pleasant to hear; it is concisely expressed, flows easily and spontaneously, and gives no suggestion that Mr. Davis writes for writing's sake. It may be that his talent were better suited by a less dramatic or, rather, less tragic subject, but even so, the present work fell far more gratefully on the ear than many novelties of the season.

STANDARD.

The music is neatly and picturesquely wrought, the scoring is gracefully constructed, the themes illustrating the three main events of the story being deftly woven into the harmonic scheme. The music throughout, if it strikes no very definite note and is more remarkable for grace than strength, happily succeeds in making a pleasing and poetical commentary on the events it attempts to portray.

MORNING POST.

Mr. Davis has taken the great English classic of Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," and of its main incidents has provided a musical illustration warm in colour and sympathetic in outline.

DAILY NEWS.

This is one of the composer's latest achievements. It is quite an interesting composition, and has, as all symphonic poems should have, a musical form of its own. The music is fanciful and picturesque, and without being highly original, has clear individuality.

MORNING LEADER.

Mr. J. D. Davis's symphonic poem, "The Maid of Astolat," is conceived in a vein of delicate and refined imagination.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

A new, or, at all events, unfamiliar, work by Mr. J. D. Davis, "The Maid of Astolat," which, for once in a way, could be most heartily praised for its many engaging qualities. It is rare, indeed, that a new work is received with such obvious marks of favour.

SUNDAY TIMES AND SUNDAY SPECIAL.

The music is characterised by a tender imagination and a rare felicity of expression. The structure is graceful in outline, but it is not without strength, the themes are distinctive and deftly treated, and the whole work shows a subtle feeling for atmosphere.

OBSERVER.

An effective, richly scored, and melodious piece of orchestral music that definitely places the composer among those of his colleagues who have really something interesting to say, and say it well.

ATHENÆUM.

The title would lead one to expect programme-music, and so it is, but only to a certain, or, we may say, legitimate extent: the story of Lancelot and Elaine accounts for the various moods of the music; while the only approach to realism is the delicate attempt to depict the floating to burial of Elaine. The work, clever, effective, and well scored, was ably given under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald.

WORLD.

Mr. Davis has much of the same sort of sense of beauty and love of form that the poet had, and the same kind of restraint—which sometimes made people say that his poetry was not strong, and that he was too far aloof from the world to be able to move it. Something of this is to be found in Mr. Davis's music, which is scored with great skill in producing atmospheric effects of the gentle kind, while the work shows a fine sense of symmetry and proportion.

SCOTSMAN.

A gracefully-written work which, ably conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, resulted in a double recall for the composer.

GLASGOW HERALD.

A work of picturesque imagination which has the merit of being appropriate as a mood-picture without being disconnected as music.

BIRMINGHAM POST.

Mr. Davis's symphonic poem "The Maid of Astolat" proved to be an eminently graceful and by no means ineffective piece of work. . . . Its themes are as a rule suggestive, and the workmanship is interesting, so that it may be taken as marking an advance in the development of the clever composer.

FULL SCORE, 10s. 6d.; STRING PARTS, 4s. 6d.; WIND PARTS, 7s. 6d.
ARRANGEMENT FOR PIANOFORTE SOLO, 3s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

It consists of five pieces by English composers of the sixteenth century, which Mr. Bantock has selected and scored in a delightful way for small orchestra. Four of them come from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, and only the first, one of Gibbons's Fantasias in four parts, was originally written for strings. It would have been no disadvantage to have this one in its original colouring; but the additional use of wood-wind and horns is so tastefully done that one cannot regret them; and since only antiquaries will ever have the chance of enjoying the Virginal pieces played as their composers wrote them, the gain of producing them in their new orchestral costumes is clear.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Bantock's Suite is a thing of pure delight from beginning to end. For a composer of tendencies which are called advanced, this Suite is a model of restraint. . . . Nos. 1, 3, and 5 are scored for a more or less complete small orchestra, though no use is made in the opening piece of trumpets or drums. The Pavan, a quietly dignified and graceful thing for strings only, is a notable example of string writing, and "Quodling's Delight," which was mightily and deservedly applauded, is to be played by an oboe, two clarinets, and a bassoon, in imitation of the ancient shawms.

MORNING POST.

The Suite is based on circa sixteenth century airs, originally extracted from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book for the purposes of a revival of "The Knight of the Burning Pestle," at Manchester last year. Their reproduction in the present form is most valuable for the airs themselves are precious heirlooms, and with the setting provided by Mr. Granville Bantock, which is so thoroughly in keeping, the worth of these, some of the most precious gems among our heritage, is increased. . . . The Suite is a masterly reproduction of atmosphere, and many must have been surprised to find such wealth of melody in old music. The Suite was cordially received.

STANDARD.

Mr. Bantock has collected a quintet of tunes by composers of the seventeenth century, taken from the Elizabethan Virginal Book preserved in the Fitzwilliam Library, Cambridge, and has cleverly knit them together in a fascinating suite. While preserving their ancient character, he has embellished the old tunes with charming and effective orchestration.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. Granville Bantock's suite of five Elizabethan pieces should be certain of popularity. The melodies are all charming, and Mr. Bantock has managed to score them in an attractive way, without once doing violence to their naive character.

MORNING LEADER.

Mr. Granville Bantock's suite is compiled from old English music. There are five numbers, but the music has been added to and scored by Mr. Bantock. The result is a very charming work that should be heard often in future. Particularly delightful are the third number, "The King's Hunt" and the last "Sellenger's Round."

THE WORLD.

Mr. Bantock has done more than edit, since he has added to the music in some cases, and scored the whole of it for small orchestra. The result is quite a delightful little suite of five numbers, of which the third (a little hunting piece by John Bull) and the finale, a dance, are particularly fascinating. The scoring has been done by Mr. Bantock's usual command of orchestral effect, which he has used in this instance to secure an old-world flavouring appropriate to the music.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The Suite consists of five charming pieces, of which the first is a fantasia by Orlando Gibbons, the second a pavan by John Dowland, the third an air with some dainty variations by John Bull; the fourth is also an air with variations, and the last a country dance, known as "Sellenger's Round," by William Byrd. These make up the delightful Suite, which has been scored by Mr. Bantock with his usual felicity and resource. It met with a very cordial reception.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

The Old English Suite is composed of five Elizabethan harpsichord pieces, arranged by Mr. Bantock for small orchestra. It proved thoroughly delightful. The curious thing was that in spite of the clever orchestration we were never taken out of the original epoch of the music.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY GAZETTE AND EXPRESS.

The Bantock Suite, exquisitely played, evoked a regular furor of applause, which was thoroughly deserved, the instrumentation of the various pieces being skilful and effective in the extreme.

ELEMENTARY

SCORE-READING EXERCISES

SELECTED AND EDITED BY

ARTHUR H. PEPPIN.

PREFATORY NOTE.

The power of reading at sight from four-part score with the proper clefs for alto and tenor may seem to the student to be hardly valuable enough to warrant the expenditure of time and trouble which it involves. We may concede that it is seldom called into requisition nowadays as a part of practical musicianship; nevertheless its indirect value must not be overlooked. Firstly, reading from four staves is useful as a training of the eye in the direction of quickness and accuracy in reading from three staves, or two; secondly, complete familiarity with the C clefs is an indispensable preliminary to the understanding of orchestral scores; thirdly, the habit of following four parts, written at their correct pitch, is of great assistance in acquiring the habit of thinking contrapuntally, and helps materially towards that clearness of brain without which no ear can unravel the complexities of polyphonic writing.

The following exercises are intended for beginners. They lead on gradually to the degree of proficiency which should enable the student to grapple successfully with Dr. Emily Daymond's most difficult exercises in the same subject.

MARKING SCHEMES.

Plans of assessing positive and relative values of performances at competitions are often discussed. Some judges favour the easy-going and, we are tempted to add, indolent plan of recording general impressions in a few words. Their judgment may be correct, although the record afterwards is vague. If, say, eight choirs each sing three pieces, such a dependance upon general impressions invites disaster, for it is quite impossible for any judge to memorise the features of all the performances and to relate them scientifically to one another. If this is conceded, the next consideration is, Under what heads should the performances be analysed? Here there is room for difference of opinion. Some schemes of headings we have seen, seem to us to attempt too much by way of analysis and therefore not to be practicable in the average conditions of competitions. It is important to group together as many points as are compatible, in order that there may not be too much time spent in the apportionment of marks or observations. Then comes another and very important matter: Should the impressions under each head be registered by figures or words? Our own experience is strongly in favour of figures. Under any one head it is fairly easy to register satisfactorily by figures slight differences of merit that no word can define so clearly. Thus, if one choir, say, is allowed 15 out of 20 for expression, it is easy to apportion 16 to another choir slightly better, and 14 to a third choir not quite so good. The words we have ourselves used are not so satisfactory as the figures, for one reason because they do not incidentally also relate the three performances to an ideal perfect standard. The figures, then, are really a refined vocabulary.

The marking scheme given below is one that has been extensively used in this country for many years. It is no doubt open to criticism in its attempt to balance the value of the various heads, but it has on the whole proved its utility by holding the field. We should be very glad to receive the opinions of adjudicators as well as of the adjudicated.

SCHOOL COMPETITIONS IN CAPE COLONY.

The fourth competition for the District Council Shield was held in the Tsomo Wesleyan Mission Church on October 12. All the songs were in four parts (S.A.T.B.), the one prescribed being Callcott's "You gentlemen of England." The following choirs competed:—

Mbulu (Mr. Jacob April).
Hange (Mr. Samuel Ncobo).
Esigubudwini (Mr. Gershom Koyana).
Tsomo (Mr. Josiah Mlokoti).
Lutuli (Mr. Titus Tsotsi).
Tshangane (Mr. Edmund Masiza).

Mr. F. Farrington, Departmental Instructor, who acted as adjudicator, reports as follows:—

Mbulu choir was weak in singing from notes, the octave marks proving a difficulty. The alto part was feeble in the two-part test. Many faults were noticed in the prescribed song, and the selected piece, "Hail, smiling morn," was poorly attempted.

Hange failed to sing the pulse-and-a-half note correctly, and octave marks were not always properly observed. The altos were behind the trebles in singing the two-part test to la. The tenor part was prominent in the songs. Congreve's "The fisherman" was very well sung.

Esigubudwini was hardly in tune. The first chords of the prescribed song were not well in tune. Mendelssohn's "Morning prayer" proved a popular item.

Tsomo wanted more vigour, but the voices were even in quality. Sight-tests were done fairly well, but more careful attention to the beat was required. Root's "Away to the meadows" was moderately sung, the tenors and basses not being note-perfect.

Lutuli showed signs of most careful training in singing from notes, the only weakness being in the alto run in the last score of the two-part test. A delightful rendering of Adam's "March of the Patriots" was given, the tenors showing to least advantage. This was undoubtedly the most finished choir.

Tshangane was moderately successful in sight-singing. Phrasing and pronunciation were faulty, especially in the selected song, "Hark! Apollo strikes the lyre" (Bishop). Otherwise the singing of this song was very good indeed.

The shield was awarded to the conductor of the Lutuli Choir, who also received a medal from the Education Department. The members of the choir received book prizes.

RAILWAY SCHOOLS CHOIR COMPETITION.

A competition was held at Naauppoort on October 23. The test prescribed was "I know a bank" (O. E. Horn), and the songs selected by the competing choirs were:

De Aar.—"Come, ever-smiling liberty" (Handel).
Cookhouse.—"Flow on, thou shining river" (J. Stevenson).
Alicedale.—"O, who will o'er the downs" (R. L. de Pearsall).
Naauppoort.—"Clouds o'er the summer sky" (Gustav von Holst).

Mr. Arthur Lee adjudicated.

Prescribed Song.—This song was sung in excellent style by the De Aar and Naauppoort children. The other two choirs were made up mostly of children of tender years, and the florid parts of the song were a little too advanced for them. A commendable feature in the case of the Cookhouse choir was the singing of the boys.

Unison Sight-Test.—This test was sung in a most satisfactory manner by De Aar, Naauppoort and Cookhouse. Alicedale was a little weak in time and dependent on certain leaders.

Two-part Sight-Test.—This was sung well by all. A few points were lost by Alicedale and Cookhouse for faulty phrasing, and De Aar alone secured full marks for "absence of leading."

The award was made in favour of the De Aar choir, which will hold the shield for the year 1909-10. The Departmental book prizes were given to the members of the choir, and the conductor's medal to Mrs. Cowling.

A NATIVE CHOIR COMPETITION.
MOUNT FRERE, CAPE COLONY.

The first competition for the shield provided by subscription was held at Osborn on October 30. The prescribed song was "Ye Mariners of England" (S.A.T.B.). The following choirs competed:—

(a) Mvuzi (Jesse Mapekula).
(b) Mount Frere (Julius Jordan).
(c) Lower Mkemane (Isaiah Zibi).
(d) Osborn (Chevers N. Falati).
(e) Mbodleni (Elliot Mablati).

The selected songs, all arranged for four mixed voices, were: (a) "In happy moments, day by day" (Wallace); (b) "Hail, smiling morn" (Spofforth); (c) "Up, away, while the day" (Becker); (d) "We rock away on the billows gay"; (e) "On, gallant company" (Southard).

Mr. F. Farrington, Departmental Instructor, adjudicated. The following is part of his report:

In sight-singing Mvuzi and Lower Mkemane were very weak, especially the former. Osborn was exceptionally strong, and Mount Frere made a good second. Mbodleni was moderately successful all round. Mount Frere was the best so far as the songs were concerned, and gave a most excellent rendering of "Hail, smiling morn," the singing being marked by careful pronunciation of the words and just expression. The Osborn choir was very well balanced, and, although lacking several of the finer points noticed in the Mount Frere choir, gave a successful rendering of both its songs.

The shield was awarded to the Osborn choir and a medal presented to the conductor, and each member of the choir received a book prize.

The competing choirs belonged to the Baca tribe.

LANCASTER.

November 24.

A very successful musical competition was organized by the Skerton Wesleyan Young Men's Committee and the members of the Wesley Church Choir. The function aroused a great amount of interest, and not only was there a large number of entries, but the Sulyard Street Schoolroom was crowded by an intensely interested audience for nearly five hours while the competitions were in progress. The adjudicators were Mr. J. W. Aldous, M.A., and Mr. T. N. B. Vincent. The highest standard of excellence was reached in the competition for choirs of mixed voices, the tests in which were Macfarren's anthem, "The Lord is my Shepherd," and Elgar's part-song, "As torrents in summer." Five choirs from Lancaster and Carnforth competed. Westham Street Wesley (Mr. C. Grantham) secured the first prize. One of the best features of the proceedings was the fine performance of the Elgar song by the massed choirs, under the conductorship of Mr. J. W. Aldous. The chief results were as follows:—

Pianoforte Solo (under 16).—S. Heller's "No. 12." Maud Hall.
Soprano Solo.—"Angels, ever bright and fair" (Handel). Miss Dorothy Watson.
Contralto Solo.—"Shepherd's cradle song" (Somervell). Miss A. Armistead.
Tenor Solo.—"I'll sing thee songs of Araby" (Clay). H. Whittaker.
Bass Solo.—"The Wolf" (Shelley). T. Rathbone Carnforth.
Mixed-Voice Choirs.—"The Lord is my Shepherd" (Macfarren) and "As torrents in summer" (Elgar). Westham Street Wesley (Mr. C. Grantham); 2 (equal), Marsh Wesley (Mr. Knowles) and Carnforth Wesley (Mr. Rigg).
Sight Reading.—Carnforth Wesley (Mr. Rigg).

SWINDON.

December 15.

A successful choir contest took place in the Mechanics' Institution, under the auspices of the Swindon and District Free Church Council. Six choirs competed—Baptist Tabernacle, Bath Road Wesleyan, Faringdon Street Wesleyan, Presbyterian, Prospect Primitive Methodist and Sanford Street Congregational. The singing was of all-round excellence, especially in the matters of attack and articulation. Dr. A. H. Brewer adjudicated, and conducted the massed choir of above 200 voices in a performance of the two test-pieces, "O Father, whose almighty power" and "Who shall win my lady fair?" and also Sullivan's "O gladsome Light."

Dr. Brewer awarded the first-prize to Faringdon Street Wesleyan, the second to Sanford Street Congregational, and the third to Baptist Tabernacle. Dr. Brewer said they had heard a good deal lately about the tax and burden thrown on the brewer, but he could assure them it was nothing compared with the responsibility that had been placed on his shoulders that night. It was the first time he had had the pleasure of hearing any singing in Swindon, and he hoped it would not be the last, for the performances had given him very great pleasure. It was a pleasure to hear fresh, bright young voices. He would like to draw attention to the tremendous advance that had been made in the singing of church choirs during the last few years. There was one thing he would suggest, and that was that more attention should be paid to secular music. One was inclined to get into a groove by practising only sacred music, and they would make much greater headway if they introduced more secular music into their rehearsals. The choir contest movement was an excellent one from many points of view. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. Morse. The originator and secretary of the competition was Mr. R. G. Cripps.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

The annual Tonic Sol-fa Competitive Festival organized by the entertainment committee of the Salford Corporation and the Tonic Sol-fa College, Manchester District Board, will take place in the Royal Technical Institute, Salford, on March 12. The tests in the choral competition for children under the age of 15 are: "Gentle swallow" (Roland Rogers), and a two-part sight-test. The solo competitions are in four classes:

- Girls, under 12, "Slumber song" (Mendelssohn).
- " " 15, "At night" (Randelger).
- Boys " 12, "May dew" (Sterndale Bennett).
- " " 15, "Nymphs and shepherds" (Purcell).

There are also classes for individual ear test, vocal duet and violin playing. Mr. A. L. Cowley will adjudicate. The secretary is Mr. J. Currie, Alderglen, Worsley, Manchester.

THE WELSH NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD. COLWYN BAY.

September 13, 14, 15, 16 and 17, 1910.

The arrangements for this great competition are now complete and the syllabus is issued. The tests in the chief classes are as follows:—

CHIEF CHORAL (150 to 175 voices).

- Requiem and Kyrie from the Requiem Mass Mozart.
- "Trip we gally," from "Dewi Sant" (St. David) Jenkins.
- "O! wild west wind" Elgar.

SECOND CHORAL (60 to 85 voices).

- "Gweddi Gwraig y Meddwyn" (The Prayer) Joseph Parry.
- "Deep in my soul" Elgar.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (60 to 80 voices).

- "Brwydr y Baltic" (The battle of the Baltic) Osborne Roberts.
- "Sorrow's tears" Cornelius.
- "The rider's song" Cornelius.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (35 to 45 voices).

- "Come, sisters, come" Mackenzie.
- "Y Môr Forwynlon" (Sea maidens) D. D. Parry.

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS (35 to 50 voices).

- "What can lambskin do" Coleridge-Taylor.
- "Awn i chwarae yn yr Eira" (In the snow now let us gather) Pedr Alaw.

ORCHESTRAL BANDS.

- Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai.

SOPRANO SOLO.

- "O! had I Jubal's lyre" (Joshua) Handel.
- "Olwen" Bryceson Trehearne.

MEZZO-SOPRANO SOLO.

- "Slumber song" Wagner.
- "To living waters" J. S. Bach.

CONTRALTO SOLO.

- "All my heart inflamed and burning" (Stabat Mater) Dvorák.
- "Jesu, Lover of my soul" Linekar.

TENOR SOLO.

- "God breaketh the Battle" (Judith) Parry.
- "Morfudd, fy Nghariad" (Morfudd, my loved one) W. Davies.

BARITONE SOLO.

- "Song of Pan" Bach.
- "Bedd Glyndwr" (Glyndwr's Grave) W. O. Jones.

BASS SOLO.

- "They that go down to the sea in ships." Purcell.
- "Rhys ap Iorwngwy" W. Davies.

It will be observed that the choral tests are searching. The two Elgar part-songs call for considerable technique, for musicianship, and for insight.

The adjudicators are to be Dr. Coward, Dr. Roland Rogers, Mr. David Jenkins, Mr. David Evans, Lieut. Dr. Williams and Mr. Daniel Evans.

THE LEITH HILL (SURREY) COMPETITION.

The extracts we give below from the report of this country-side festival will be read with interest. They illustrate what can be accomplished when the aims are high and the means adopted for their realization are practical. The motto of the festival is Musica won the cause.

REPORT FOR 1909.

"Now that our competition has passed its fifth year, it may, we trust, fairly claim to have justified its existence. A beginning has been made, which promises well for the future, and it is our hope that the competition festivals will gradually achieve something lasting, and will have results too deep and widespread to be tabulated and recorded in the dry pages of a Report.

"Many of those in this neighbourhood who care for music have been drawn together; and, by working in combination, we have been enabled to study fine works, and to listen to beautiful music which otherwise would have been out of our reach. In this way we hope that music is entering into our lives and thoughts with more fullness and reality as each year goes by.

"We are now affiliated to the Association of Musical Competition Festivals, which exists for the furtherance and improvement of these festivals all over England. The Association numbers many distinguished musicians among its supporters, and by joining it we become part of a great whole, and unite ourselves to a vigorous movement which is making for musical progress—instead of pursuing a solitary way. This sense of the unity of the movement was vividly brought before us by Miss Wakefield, the founder of competition festivals in England, who honoured us by coming to distribute the banners and prizes this year. By her inspiring speech, she made us feel proud of taking our small part in a work which has been said to represent 'the most vital movement in the musical life of England to-day.'

"Turning from the general to the particular, it is encouraging to hear on excellent authority that at this year's competition the tenors and basses showed considerable improvement. There can also be no doubt that the sight-reading, though still very weak, is yet advancing. We made a new departure by deciding to give a festival concert twice in the day, first in the afternoon, and again in the evening. This arrangement enabled all those who had studied the concert music to take part in one or other of the concerts, and also gave an opportunity to a much larger audience to hear the music. It meant a hard day's work for all concerned, for the competition began at 9 a.m., but the choirs rose to the occasion, were in their places with admirable punctuality and went through the day's strenuous programme without flagging or failing. The conductor and amateur players had to undertake an arduous day of rehearsals and concerts, but one and all were fired with enthusiasm, and carried everything through magnificently."

The following was the concert programme:—

Chorale, "Jesu, joy of man's desiring" J. S. Bach.
COMBINED CHOIRS.

Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in E major (two movements)
Mr. ISIDORE SCHWILLER. J. S. Bach.

42nd Psalm, "As the hart pants" Mendelssohn.
COMBINED CHOIRS.

Symphony, No. 8, in B minor ("The Unfinished Symphony") Schubert.

Songs, {" "Orpheus with his lute" } .. R. Vaughan Williams.
{" "Boy Johnny" }
Miss BETTY BOOKER.

Madrigal, "When Allen-a-Dale" R. de Pearsall.
COMBINED CHOIRS.

Miss M. Vaughan Williams is the secretary, and Dr. Vaughan Williams is an active force in the management.

ANTONIO STRADIVARI
HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were fully qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice." The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

THE BEST PIANISTS

are those who play with most expression. Much keyboard practice kills delicacy of tone and control, but the Macdonald Smith System cultivates it to the full, without any drudgery.

Mr. E. W., of Ashton-under-Lyne, says:

"You have opened a new world to me."

Mr. G. E. D., of Gore, New Zealand, says:

"The technical rules and hints, which I have applied, have alone been worth the three guineas."

M. MACDONALD SMITH, 19, BLOOMSBURY SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

Playing for Pleasure.

However good your technique and power of execution, you cannot derive pleasure from your pianoforte playing unless you can read music as readily and easily as reading a book. Playing pieces which you have had to study and learn can give only a very limited enjoyment. It is not difficult to acquire the ability to play even the most advanced music at first sight; but you can only do so by the aid of my System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing. By any other means you will have to give years of practising for many hours daily, while my system involves little more than 15 minutes' daily practising for three months. The results are certain. Provided that you have the necessary finger dexterity, no piece, however advanced, will be too difficult to play at first sight. With students less advanced the results are proportionately great.

FEE FOR COMPLETE CORRESPONDENCE COURSE, £3 3s.

My Booklet describes the principles and methods of the System. Sent free to any pianist on application to L. M. EHREMYER, 27, Chancery Lane, W.C.

(Personal Lessons in all Branches of Pianoforte Playing.)

IN AN EMERGENCY, WORKS DONE AT SIGHT.

"Mr. Sadleur Browne is the possessor of a fine, sweet tenor voice, of remarkable purity. He gave a delightful rendering of 'Good-night, Beloved,' and an old sea-song entitled 'The Lowland Sea,' and in response to an encore he substituted 'Myrra,' which was charmingly interpreted."—Norwich Daily Press.

"THE SEASONS."—"The Cavatina, 'Distressful nature faintly sinks,' stood out in bold relief as the most delicate piece of solo-singing in the whole concert, and won him a well-merited encore. In the air, 'The traveller stands perplexed,' he was likewise altogether admirable."—Hampshire Advertiser.

"This short air ('Behold and see if there be any sorrow'), as rendered by Mr. Sadleur Browne, is settled in my mind as an example of sacred expression unique in its elevation and intensity. The accent of pathos could scarcely go farther than in the above."—Western Daily News.

M. VINCENT D'INDY ON CÉSAR FRANCK.*

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

One could wish that the first book on César Franck to appear in England had been written by an Englishman, if only as an indication that Franck's music was already well known in this country; but as that, unfortunately, is not yet the case, it is well to have the work of propaganda done by any competent writer, and of M. Vincent d'Indy's unusual competence in this matter there cannot be the least doubt. Himself a pupil of Franck, an accomplished musician sympathetic to most that is good in modern music and yet with his roots firmly embedded in the past, a thinker and a not inconsiderable man of letters, he is on the whole the writer most fitted to speak with authority on César Franck and his music. His own temperament, in which austerity occasionally becomes tartness, does indeed obtrude itself disadvantageously here and there; but on the whole the book is admirably sane and sound. Mrs. Newmarch has of course done the work of translation excellently, and has made the volume more useful to English readers by a preface in which she discusses the progress of musical taste in France during the 19th century, and gives an interesting résumé of the career of M. d'Indy himself.

It was quite in keeping with the irony of things that the greatest French musician of the second half of the last century should not have been a Frenchman. History is full of these little strokes of humour. The greatest Frenchman of modern times—Napoleon—was an Italian. The greatest modern German musician—Beethoven—was half a Dutchman. Germany gets the credit, not only for Liszt, who was a Hungarian, for Gluck, who was a Bohemian, and for Haydn, who was a Croat, but for four of the greatest living conductors—Richter (a Hungarian), Nikisch (a Hungarian), Mahler (a Bohemian Jew) and Weingartner (a Dalmatian), César Franck was a Belgian, born at Liège in 1822, in the Walloon country, which, as M. d'Indy says, is 'peculiarly French, not only in sentiment and language but also in its external aspect,' and at the same time 'German in its customs and surroundings.' It is not too fanciful to trace to this complex heredity and environment, as M. d'Indy does, the main qualities of Franck's eclectic nature, that made him 'the creator of a symphonic art that was exceedingly French in its balance and precision, while at the same time it rested upon the solid basis of Beethoven's art, itself the outcome of still earlier musical traditions.' The Franck family settled finally in France in 1846, and César in time became a naturalised French citizen. For nearly half-a-century he lived a laborious life in Paris as a comparatively humble teacher of music, chiefly the organ and composition. The leading French musicians of the time, especially those holding official positions, were insensately jealous of him and unkind to him. M. d'Indy's explanation seems the right one—that they knew him to be their superior in every way, and dreaded him accordingly. The teaching at the Conservatoire appears to have been strangely incompetent in many respects, and we can imagine that when Franck became professor of the organ there, in 1872, some of his colleagues were made to look rather small. One anecdote told by M. d'Indy will suffice to show the intellectual and musical calibre of some of the prominent Parisian musicians of that day. When Franck's Symphony was given in 1889 by the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, M. d'Indy asked one of the authorities—'a professor at the Conservatoire and a kind of factotum on the committee'—what he thought of it. 'That a symphony?' he replied in contemptuous tones. 'But, my dear sir, who ever heard of writing for the cor anglais in a symphony? Just mention a single symphony by Haydn or Beethoven introducing the cor anglais. There, well, you see, your Franck's music may be whatever you please, but it will never be a symphony!' There could hardly be much communion of soul between Franck and a man like this; and when Franck's abilities and the natural loveliness of his nature drew to him most of the best of the younger musicians in Paris, he seems to have been disliked even beyond the normal limits of hatred permissible in Conservatoires and Academies and other places where men are engaged in teaching the humanising art of music. When he gave a private performance of the then unknown 'Beatitudes' at his house, and invited the Minister of Fine Arts, the critics, and the Conservatoire professors, thinking—good, simple man—that all these disinterested seekers after truth would be anxious to hear a new and beautiful work, most of them found they had engagements elsewhere, while the one or two critics who turned up 'fled in a few minutes.' When he died, in November, 1890, 'no official deputation from the Ministry or the Department of Fine Arts accompanied the body to its last resting-place. Even the Conservatoire, which reckoned him among its professors, neglected to send a representative to the funeral of this organist whose lofty views of art had always seemed dangerous to the peace of this official institution. The director, Ambroise Thomas, who had all his life been given to pouring forth platitudes on less worthy tombs, quickly took to his bed when he heard that a member of Franck's family had come to invite him to the funeral. Other important professors followed suit, and were conveniently taken ill, in order to avoid compromising themselves.' It seems incredible that such rancour should have been aroused by a man who, from all accounts, was singularly amiable, modest, tolerant and lovable, and that for some time after his death his influence should have been chiefly confined to his pupils, and a very small circle beyond these. The explanation seems to be that while Franck was big enough to arouse the suspicious fears and hatreds of smaller people, he had not the masterful kind of bigness that feeds on and is nourished by hatred and abuse—the quality that makes a man like Wagner or Strauss simply set his teeth and swear that he will come out on top or die. There was nothing of the fighter in Franck. Certain aspects of life, indeed, he never understood. Those of us who have heard the ‘Beatitudes’ have noted with some amusement how completely he seems to stand outside the character of Satan. Into all the other sentiments of the oratorio he enters with peculiar intimacy; but the sentiment of evil is something he knows only by hearsay, and his conscientious but unsuccessful attempt to express it in his music reminds us of an artist who has never been out of his own Midland village, and never seen the sea, trying to paint a wreck in a storm. M. d’Indy finds the explanation of the failure of this part of the ‘Beatitudes’ in the fundamental sweetness and simplicity of Franck’s nature. ‘I can never forget,’ he says, ‘his efforts to put on an awe-inspiring air, his frowns, the contortions of his mouth and the queer sounds of his voice, which caused us to smile rather than tremble, when he sang “C’est moi l’esprit du mal, qui sois roi de la terre.” Poor, dear master! His good faith was unshaken, and he honestly believed himself for the moment to be “the spirit of evil” —he who had only lived and worked for good! Incapable, therefore, of drawing upon himself for the expression of emotions which he never felt but superficially, he borrowed the style of the most inferior eclectics, and here . . . falls back on Meyerbeer.’ A man like this was wholly lacking not only in the art of Conservatoire intrigue, but in the art of impressing himself upon the general public; and it is not at all surprising that when, after being passed over by the State for many years, he was decorated with the ribbon of a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1885, it was not as a composer but as ‘Franck (César Auguste), Professor of Organ.’ Yet this gentle, humble, and retiring man was the biggest force in French music of the latter half of the nineteenth century, and has given it, by his own work and through his pupils, an impulse so fecund that its vigour is still undiminished.

What he has done, in the first place, is to raise immensely the standard of French instrumental music. France, until recently, has not been rich in this kind of art, and the fact that there is still, I believe, no commodious concert hall in Paris, as distinguished from theatres or opera houses, is very significant. Expert observers like M. Romain Rolland date a distinct renaissance of French music from 1870. For a time it lay under the Wagnerian influence, the most vital reaction against which came first from César Franck and afterwards from Debussy. It is perhaps the very individuality of Franck that has stood in the way of a general German appreciation of him, for our good friends in Germany have got into a sad habit of thinking that great music means simply German music. Most of them have not yet grasped the elementary fact that music may talk French, or English, and still talk sensibly and profoundly. They are inclined to be a trifle condescending to music that has a non-Teutonic idiom. M. Rolland gives an instance. In an article on ‘Musique française et musique allemande,’ he tells us of a recent festival of French and German music held in Strasburg, at which he was greatly hurt by the apathy of good German musicians towards the best modern French art. That of César Franck was received coolly, but the audience waxed enthusiastic over a superficial work of Charpentier, and Richard Strauss graciously confessed to M. Rolland that he found it charming, ‘real music of Montmartre.’ M. Rolland rightly waxes indignant at the patronising impertinence of this attitude, with its implied theory that the French are only good enough to supply the world with piquant, sparkling trivialities, while it is to the Germans we must look for profounder things. There is a ‘French spirit’ that means gaiety, lightness, and glitter; there is also a ‘French spirit’—the spirit of the great serious poets and thinkers and dreamers of France—that means more than this, that means earnest emotion, and intellectual lucidity, and incomparable grace of style. And of all this César Franck is perhaps the best modern representative in music. He is modern, yet not Wagnerian; a consummate technician, yet no mechanical product of the schools; a man of deep feeling, but of a type of feeling that is wholly characteristic of himself and his race, owing nothing to the Teutonic tradition. He is indeed one of the heirs of Bach and Beethoven, but in no sense an imitator of either of them. He has thus been able to give French music an impetus it sorely needed; and wherever we look into the changed conditions of Parisian musical life—at the newer schools of composers, at the larger and more intelligent public for serious instrumental music, or at the excellent work done by the Schola cantorum—we find either his influence at work or some other influence that has grown out of that.

MUSINGS IN A LIBRARY.

I.

I am no antiquary; indeed old things rather repel than attract me; but it interests me to spend my rare intervals of leisure in that oddest of odd places, a musical library. Few people have ever had the run of this place; few would be able to find it even if they knew where to look for it. It is a sort of den, or vault, contrived in the heart of a large building and having no walls but the gigantic bookcases which comprise it. In these cases are copies of what must surely be nearly all the musical compositions and works on music printed before the year 1800. There are very few that have appeared since that time, because these are modern and therefore valueless, not to say despicable. There are also tons and tons of wonderful volumes containing manuscript copies of madrigals, motets, and other vocal works of the 17th century, done in the days when printed scores were unattainable. It amuses me, I say, to dip at random into one of these cases and bring out a volume of music, the existence of which I never suspected, the composer of which has been forgotten this many a long year, and to endeavour to find out who he was, what he did, and why he did it. Some of the results of these gropings I propose to lay before the readers of the Musical Times with the earnest assurance that I intend writing on the level of the man in the street, and not as a learned person—a character to which I have no claim.

Well, I was idly wondering to myself one day why it was that I had never, since my student days, attempted to write a String Quartet—for I must tell you, with a blush, that I dabble in composition now and then. Diving into one of the mighty cases of my library (I call it mine, though as a matter of fact it owns me, rather than I it), I drew forth a portly volume, one of a set of four, indexed on the inside as follows :

QUARTETTOS (sic).

3	by Pleyel, Op. 67.
6	„ 25.
3	„ 23.
3	„ 35.
3	„ 17.
6	M. Viotti, Op. 1.
6	Boccherini ...
6	Cirri, Op. 13.
6	P. Vachon ...
6	„ Op. 5.
9	Hofmeister, Op. 9.
3	Pugnani.
3	Martinelli.
3	Krommer.
3	Romberg.
6	Stamitz.

Another similar set of volumes adjoining declared itself to contain 73 more quartets, by equally obscure persons and mostly in sets of 6. I was somewhat staggered, especially by the fact that such people as Cirri and Vachon (unknown to Grove) should be able to get quartets finely engraved—aye, on copper plates—while we unworthy moderns dared not contemplate such an act. They must have been very good stuff, surely! Presently I found that Grove had a word or two about Stamitz. He was the scion of a very musical stock and, besides these quartets, published—actually published—(it does not say at whose expense) many sets of six out of his seventy symphonies! And it was the merest chance that I had not died without ever hearing of him. This must be seen to: let us take his sixth Quartet (it ought to be better than his first) and see what we can make of it. Accordingly I got a sheet of paper, and wrote out in a short score the four parts of about half the first movement. It begins thus :

I only give a portion of the lower parts; the reader can supply the remainder with little difficulty. Well, is this anything but rather inferior Haydn? I skimmed through the other five quartets—the first violin parts—and although there was all that piquant diversity of note-values that makes Haydn's music so much brighter than that of Mozart, there was not a subject, not a phrase, that had any individuality. After this I tried several of the other unknowns with exactly the same result. Pleyel, as everybody knows, was a pupil of Haydn, and although he was said to have shown some individuality at first—which has escaped my search—the majority of his works are mere pallid reflections of his master.

Now it is very easy for the superficial mind to dismiss this matter as unimportant and to say, 'Great men always have their imitators; the works of the great men endure; those of their satellites are forgotten.' There is more in it than this. Stamitz and Pleyel were highly esteemed in their day, as is proved by their quartets achieving the costly dignity of print. I feel that the men themselves were earnest artists enough—a man hardly writes 70 symphonies without having something in him—but they were educated under a false and pernicious system which has proved fatal to all but artists of the most powerful calibre. This system, not yet swept away, was in full vigour when I was a student. Its doctrine was, in effect, that the student was to cultivate a blind, uncritical reverence for the great masters of the past and to 'form a correct style' (so they put it) by endeavouring to imitate them. At the same time it was impressed upon him that this imitation was a vain task, for he could never, never hope to rival, much less to surpass his models. Above all he was taught that art, literature, morals—the progress of the world in fact—has always followed a dwindling course, like this :

This, which we call 'the classical tradition,' would, if pushed to its logical conclusion, hold that Palestrina was a greater composer than Mozart, and Orlando di Lasso than Beethoven, but such absurdities were evaded by another cardinal doctrine, namely, that all the great were equally great (like the saints), and standards of relative merit could apply only to the living, or the recently dead.

I believe that artists who have accepted this tradition, and looked upon individuality as a thing to be shunned rather than cultivated, have thereby sold their birthright for a mess of pottage. They have followed the line of least resistance (a pretty mixture of metaphor!), and have sought immediate repute by producing work which was in the prevailing fashion. Whether it be madrigals or string quartets, or the shop-ballads of to-day, the man who does this may achieve his object and win temporary fame (and a penny or two), but when he is as dead as his model his work will be much deader; for it is written that the Pantheon shall not include any but original statues.

Another point struck me in looking up the lives of Stamitz, Pleyel, and Co. There lived—from 1809 to 1876—an English musician whose artistic career was very similar to theirs. If you were to read a memoir of Thomas Mudie, you would be naturally loth to believe that a second-rate Englishman could compare with a second-rate Austrian or German, yet the fact remains that his symphonies, though very Haydnesque, are distinctly more engaging than those of Pleyel. But not a note of Mudie's mountain of music—not so much as a song—has survived him, nor does it deserve to have done so. Some hundreds of his MSS. (there was no print for him!) are stowed away in corners of this library in dusty packages, which even I have scarce the courage to open, while his foreign rivals stand in rows of rotting calf-bound volumes, with delusive pride, upon the sagging shelves of the bookcases.

These reflections all crowding upon my mind seemed to explain quite clearly to me—I do not know if they do to you—both why I have never written a string quartet and why Stamitz and the rest used always to write them in half-dozens. When a man simply fills up a form he can go on doing it, with slight variations, all his life. There was a painter whom I knew, who painted nothing else but boats on a canal. He finished a hundred pictures every year and always sold them off by auction, without frames, for what they would fetch. I saw one of his canvases once nailed over a broken window. I would think it as much a crime as murder to prostitute my talent like that. Whether anybody wants our music or not doesn't matter in the least. The composer has to spend nearly the whole of his life learning his craft, and each experiment that he puts forth must be an attempt to improve upon what his predecessors have done, or it is nothing.

Now the art of the string quartet has gone on from Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, to Brahms, Dvorák and Tanéïeff, and unless I feel that I can write a finer quartet than Tanéïeff I have no business to meddle with the matter. I have no wish to have my compositions respectfully embalmed* after my death, and put into fat volumes that nobody will ever open. Think of it! One hundred and fifty different string quartets by eighteen different forgotten composers. And these works, each of four movements complete in all its parts, and beautifully printed, will never be heard, but stand like tombstones to the memory of their authors. Memory! Mocking word! Not even an Algernon Ashton walks through this graveyard and writes to the papers about the way these tombstones are neglected. Yet how melancholy to think that all the fine brain-work expended on the manufacture of these things could not save them from the fate of the mere shop-ballad! Yet there is comfort, too, for me in that thought. Farewell, imitatores, servum pecus!

THE ORGAN ACCOMPANIMENT OF CHURCH MUSIC.

BY WALTER G. ALCOCK.

The organ owes, if not its birth, at least its early development to sacred surroundings, and is still considered a necessary adjunct to the music of the English Church. It is, therefore, well to bear this in mind when discussing its use as a means of accompaniment. Until the early part of the last century, the instrument simply duplicated the vocal parts, except in solos, which naturally, with their figured bass, gave the organist scope for his invention. But the progress made in secular instrumental music, though for long without effect upon that of the Church, gradually influenced the accompaniments both of Services and Anthems, and the advance made in this respect may be appreciated by comparing the organ part of earlier works with, e.g., Wesley's 'Wilderness' or Stanford's recent setting of the Magnificat in G. Yet this development has led to abuses in accompaniment, intensified by the modern discoveries in variety of tone and complex mechanism, leading to the employment of organs out of all proportion to the needs of actual Service Music. The organ recital of modern times, with its orchestral transcriptions, has also much to answer for, though these, in their place and at suitable times, may be considered legitimate enough.

It will of course be said that had the early composers possessed our instruments they would have elaborated their accompaniments; but even had they done so, we should still be the poorer for the loss of the pure vocal writing which made them famous and so completely fitted the purpose for which it was produced. It seems that we are in danger of losing sight of the essentials of Church music, which ought to serve and not dictate to religion. Whether in composition or interpretation, the underlying thought must be devotional, and as far removed from a mere 'performance' as is humanly possible. The modern element of musical excitement has led some, indeed, to wish for a second Palestrina! Fortunately, the influence of plain-song is still felt in many Church compositions of our time. As an example, the happiest use of the ancient intonation to the 'Credo' and 'Gloria in excelsis' is made in Stanford's masterly setting in B flat, while in the 'Te Deum' it forms the theme upon which the work is built. Among other works which also exhibit the organ in its dignified and legitimate use may be included such settings of the Evening Canticles as Martin in A, Bennett in A, and Noble in B minor. These and other modern examples, both of Services and Anthems, share, with those of earlier writers, thoughts at once lofty in ideal and worthy of the Sanctuary. What is also of great importance in the subject under consideration, is that such modern Anthems and Services can be effectively rendered upon an organ of moderate size and equipment without danger of over-assertiveness, unsuitable in the circumstances of time and place. Some latitude may be claimed in the accompaniment of many anthems, on the ground of descriptiveness and wider scope, though this must be governed by the same underlying principles, and legitimate use of the organ.

It is in turning to the Psalms and Hymns that we come nearer to the weak point of some modern organists. They may be brilliant soloists, and in every way estimable in their wish and intention to maintain the high tone of the musical part of the service, but the very freedom possible in such accompaniments is a real peril to more than a few.

The organ-loft has been the nursery of so much which, if sincere, is inartistic, and for that very reason deep-rooted, that we have everything to gain if we desire to become and remain worthy of our high profession. The fantastic ideas sometimes entertained in regard to the Psalms also give one food for reflection. The use of the 32-ft. reed in the 'Venite' would hardly be thought necessary or justified by its effect. Yet that has been done, and equalled by the use of the full Swell throughout a complete psalm. Both these performances were quite intentional, and no doubt sincere. The difficulty seems to be for an organist to keep his hands off the keys, or his feet off the pedals, even for a verse. The constant use of the 16-ft. bass becomes wearisome, and fails in its effect when it is wanted. Also, it must be borne in mind that the upper part of the pedal-board should be used in preference to the lower, except when a massive effect is required, as in the Gloria to the Psalms, or other similar cases. Let it also be remembered that rather than imitate as realistically as possible all that passes before our notice, we should endeavour only to suggest; and there are many occasions when silence is even better than sound.

The Hymn-tune, that retrograde movement from the grand old chorale, or voice of the multitude—the People's Song—is worthy of attention, though it has deteriorated so often into a part-song. It is yet possible for the organist to secure even for this a manly and dignified rendering, though sentimentality is too often its chief characteristic. There are occasions when, of course, nothing can be done. There exists a hymn book in which the tune of 'Home, sweet home' is set to the words of 'I could not do without Thee'! In hymn accompaniment all extravagant and undue marks of expression should be avoided. Such maltreatment as playing the treble part on the Great Tromba, with the left hand on the full Swell, while the left foot is pumping out the bass staccato on the 16-ft. open, and the right foot securely lashed to the Swell pedal, should be numbered among the things that unfortunately have been.

How many give a thought to the playing of the two chords constituting an Amen? There is a well-known case of an organist who instructed his deputy 'never to forget the "coaxing-note" for the Amens!' Can it be considered artistic or even necessary to put down the top note of the first chord of an Amen before the remainder? Can we wonder that the Church organist is not always considered an artist?

Let us remember that we have the power of impressing men for good, and the privilege of supporting earnest worshippers in their praise and prayer.

In the accompaniment to the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, it may no doubt be an ingenious and clever thing to introduce parts of the 'Siegfried Idyll,' and this has actually been done. But is it fitting to introduce such ideas, though associated with music so lovely, at such solemn and important moments? Rather let the harmonies be few and simple, enough to support the voices without distracting the attention from the real meaning of the words. The dominant thought should not be 'How can I astonish everybody in some entirely new way?'

The question of Voluntaries may perhaps be touched upon here, and there is no doubt some difficulty in selecting music which may prepare the minds of the congregation for the Service which follows. One too often hears a perfunctory and thoughtless performance, which, if it has any effect at all, distracts the listener. To those who have the ability to extemporise, it may be an opportunity to reflect what we may hope to be a devotional frame of mind. In other cases, there are many movements of fitting character which may be used. There is also in course of preparation by Messrs. Novello a series of Introductory Voluntaries by various composers, each lasting about one minute, which should prove acceptable and useful. The out-going Voluntary is of scarcely less importance. Nothing can be more disturbing, after a solemn and devotional service, with possibly a sermon which brings one face to face with the realities of life and death, than to hear from the organ a light-hearted and irresponsible Voluntary. We have heard Handel's chorus, 'O, the pleasure of the plains,' on such an occasion: no doubt a fine chorus, but, then and there, entirely inappropriate.

In conclusion, it may be said that the organist should always bear in mind the end towards which he is working. By all means let the organ develop, becoming more and more responsive to the calls made upon it, either from tonal or technical considerations; but when used as an accompaniment to Church music, it must still jealously guard the Church's traditions. So long as our Church instruments include their full complement of real 'organ' stops, of non-imitative character, just so long may we hope to maintain the dignity and beauty of the music of the Sanctuary; then the congregation would feel that Church music is something separate and apart, and that while within the hallowed precincts they leave the world and its cares elsewhere.

HOW A TRUMPET IS MADE.

By D. J. BLAICKLEY.

II.—THE NATURAL TRUMPET AND HORN.

As examples of the short, straight trumpet, the ancient Roman tuba and the modern coach-horn may be named. Considerations of the rigidity of the tube and the convenience of handling limit the length of such instruments to about four feet, and a consequent easy compass limited upwards by the sixth harmonic. If we would increase the compass, the necessary extra length must be disposed of by some manner of bending, and in the lituus, the Roman cavalry trumpet, the form given was that of the letter J, the bell end being turned upwards. Other instruments used in the Roman armies were, in quality, rather of the bugle and horn type than of the trumpet, and were bent into large curves.

[Assuming that we have a short trumpet on which the fourth and fifth harmonics, or c'' and e'' , can be sounded, and that we wish to obtain the d between these, the addition of tubing sufficient in length to lower the pitch an octave will give the desired result. By this alteration, while all the original notes remain (but, relatively to the fundamental, an octave higher), new notes are introduced intermediate in pitch between each of the original notes on the short trumpet. In the following table is shown how the fourth and fifth notes of the short trumpet are replaced by the eighth and tenth on the altered instrument, or, in general, that certain notes are common to both, and that the ninth note is the required d'' . It may be at once stated that the eleventh and thirteenth notes do not strictly agree with any notes in the diatonic scale, and that the seventh and fourteenth are slightly flat for B flat. Some considerations arising from these facts will be dwelt upon later.

NATURAL SCALE OF THE TRUMPET.

The upward limit of compass is indefinite, depending chiefly upon the ability of the player, and on long trumpets the pedal or fundamental note is practically impossible; even the second harmonic is seldom used.

The short straight horn, thus increased in length and bent into a convenient form for handling, has become the typical natural or simple trumpet, which has been subjected to no material change for several hundred years. For a long time its use, apart from military purposes, was reserved for kings and nobles, and trumpeters were the aristocracy of wind-instrument players. Town bands were not allowed to employ either trumpeters or kettle-drummers, and the first recorded departure from this is a grant to the town of Augsburg by the Emperor Sigismund in 1426, of the privilege of keeping town trumpeters, for which the town paid a good sum to the imperial exchequer.

The important position held by the trumpet in former times in Court bands may be judged from the records of those maintained by our own sovereigns. King Edward III. had five trumpeters in a band of nineteen musicians, King Henry VIII. fourteen trumpeters in a band of forty-two, and Queen Elizabeth no less than sixteen trumpeters, out of a similar total of forty-two performers.

As in former days trumpets were always pitched in D^{\sharp} , and yet the part-music written for them comprised a range of three octaves, it must be explained that the difficulty of the compass was met by making the instruments on which the upper parts were played, of smaller bore. Such an instrument with small bore, and small, shallow-cupped mouthpiece, was known as the clarino or clareta, as distinguished from the tromba, or trumpet proper. The illustrations given on p. 83 show the contrast between an elementary type, and the standard model of trumpet as it has existed for three or four centuries.

African war-horn or trumpet, of ivory, in the possession of Messrs. Boosey & Co. This instrument may be regarded as an example of a natural horn, and the type from which all our trumpets and horns have sprung. The mouth-hole is at the side, in the position marked (a). (See reference to natural horns and tusks on p. 14 of January number.)

Copper trumpet with mounts in silver, handsomely embossed. The following inscription appears in raised letters on the bell-rim: 'Augustine Dudley 1651. Londini. Fecit.' This instrument, now in the possession of Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, is reputed to have been found on the field of the Battle of Worcester. The mouthpiece is missing.

For the lowest part, an instrument of rather larger bore was used, and the whole family comprised the compass here shown:

COMPASS OF THE TRUMPET.

The following two short extracts from Kappey's 'History of Military Music' show the manner of writing for trumpets in four parts, with kettle-drums:

FLOURISH FOR TRUMPETS.

GRAND TRUMPETER MARCH.

AUFZUG, FEIERLICH (MARCH, SOLEMN).

In orchestral compositions the trumpet has held its place since the time of Monteverde, and it is remarkable that some of the old trumpet parts were carried upwards to a degree that is now never attempted. The following passage for trumpets in D natural occurs in J. S. Bach's 'Christmas Cantata':

in which the 'top C,' sounding D, is the sixteenth harmonic, and even higher notes were written by this master.

Although D was the generally recognized key or pitch of the trumpet, we find that Praetorius (Synagma, 1618) shows a crook, or additional bent tube, to lower the pitch to C. In the middle of the 18th century the general use of crooks was introduced, and F became a customary key for the trumpet, with crooks to lower the pitch through the different keys to B flat and even to A natural. If crooks—other than the crook to lower the D trumpet to C—were known in Handel's time, he did not use them, as his trumpet parts are always for instruments in D or C. His method of writing was to show the actual pitch of the notes as sounded, but the more usual plan is to write for the trumpet as a 'transposing' instrument, that is, its pitch note, or 'doh,' is almost always treated as C, the fourth natural harmonic being written as middle C. The exception to this rule is in the use of the modern high-pitched trumpets in B flat and A, for which instruments middle C represents the second harmonic.

It has been stated that certain notes, especially the eleventh and thirteenth harmonics, are not in agreement with any notes in the diatonic scale. In the hands of good players, the pitch of the notes can be modified by the lips, but other means have been attempted without having recourse to keys or valves. In 1780 a trumpet was introduced by Michael Wögel having the bell curved round sufficiently to allow of the introduction of the hand, by which means the inaccuracy of intonation of these upper notes could be corrected and other notes introduced. The true trumpet quality was, however, so greatly impaired that the invention was in use for only a short time.

Our attention may now be turned to a brief consideration of instruments of the horn class—that is, instruments chiefly conical in form, being without the large proportion of cylindrical tubing which is the main factor in giving to the trumpet its brilliant, characteristic tone.

Of these, the various small hunting and coach-horns may be dismissed as being without musical value. The army bugle, however, is worthy of notice, as it is from it that many of our modern brass instruments have sprung. It was formerly pitched in C, with a crook for B \flat , but is now made in B \flat without crook. For military calls, notes from the second to the sixth harmonic are used, written thus:

but a few higher notes are practicable.

The French horn, which in some ways may be considered the most important brass instrument in the orchestra, is generally regarded as the connecting link between the 'wood-wind' and the 'brass,' for its tone blends well with the flutes and reed instruments. Its quality is mellow and plaintive when piano or mezzo-forte, but in forte passages it can give tones suggestive of anguish and even despair. This valuable instrument has been evolved from the Waldhorn or Cor de chasse used by the mediæval foresters and huntsmen, and, as now known, has a widely expanding bell, small tubing, chiefly conical, and a mouthpiece with a deep, funnel-shaped cup about five-eighths of an inch in diameter at the rim.

In the sequence of tones the French horn follows the law of natural harmonics as explained in the description of the trumpet, and indeed this is the fundamental principle which must be understood in its application to every brass instrument. The horn, however, is relatively an octave lower than the trumpet: the length which determines the horn as being in B flat alto is the same as that of a trumpet in B flat basso, and the horn in F (its most usual pitch), with its twelve feet of tubing, is twice the length of the trumpet in F. Hence the common chord as written in C for the fourth, fifth, sixth, and eighth harmonics sounds thus:

For convenience of handling, the instrument is coiled in such a manner that, when firmly held in the left hand, the right hand can rest in the bell-mouth. The object of this, so far as the natural horn is concerned, is that by the greater or less closing of the bell-mouth, semi-tones and even whole tones can be introduced between the natural harmonics. This manipulation is known as 'hand-stopping,' and although the modern valve-systems have lessened its importance, it has afforded a valuable means of increasing the capabilities of the horn. For further details the reader may consult a lecture by the writer on 'The French horn,' published in the 'Proceedings of the Musical Association' for 1908-1909 (thirty-fifth Session).

Occasional Notes.

The degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causâ, was conferred upon Mr. W. H. Hadow by the University of Oxford during last term, on his leaving for Newcastle. The Vice-Chancellor (Dr. Warren) presided at the meeting in the Sheldonian Theatre, and Mr. Hadow was presented for the degree by the Professor of Music, Sir Walter Parratt, in a eulogistic Latin speech. Every Oxford musician who could be spared from duty was present. Mr. Hadow was entertained at lunch the same day by the members of the Musical Club, when he was presented with a complete set of Bach's works. The Professor of Music presided, and warmly praised Mr. Hadow's work during his many years' stay in Oxford.

The scheme of Operatic Festival performances at the King's Theatre, Edinburgh, arranged by Herr Ernst Denhof in conjunction with the Carl Rosa Company, referred to by our Edinburgh correspondent last month, is one of considerable interest. It consists of two complete cycles of Wagner's 'Nibelung's Ring' in English, beginning on February 28 and ending on March 12, the intervening evenings being occupied by six special performances of other operas which have yet to be announced. Hofkapellmeister Michael Balling, who conducted the performances of the 'Ring' last year at Bayreuth, has been specially engaged, and a number of distinguished vocalists who appeared in the English performances of the 'Ring' at Covent Garden during the last two seasons have been secured. We cordially wish every success to this enterprising scheme.

The second Brighton Musical Festival will take place in the Dome on February 2 to 5 inclusive. The opening performance will be Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah.' On the following day Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's new cantata 'Endymion' will be given for the first time, together with selections from Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman' and 'Die Meistersinger.' On Friday, Verdi's 'Requiem' and Sir Charles Stanford's 'Ode to discord' will be performed, and a new work for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra by James Dear, entitled 'Songs of the open air,' will receive its first performance. The afternoon programme of Saturday will include Paderewski's New Symphony, Christian Sinding's 'Rondo infinito,' under the composer's direction, and two new works composed expressly for the festival—'Life moods,' by Arthur Hervey, and 'Cinderella,' by W. H. Speer. The festival will conclude in the evening with Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' Christian Sinding's Symphony in D minor (first performance in England), under the composer's direction, and a New Symphonic March by Rutland Boughton, also conducted by the composer. Altogether a highly eclectic and well-varied selection, upon which the conductor-in-chief, Mr. Joseph Sainton, is to be congratulated.

Dr. Charles Harriss is at present in Australia, organizing his great scheme of musical festivals which he contemplates giving throughout that country during the spring of next year, with the assistance of Dr. Henry Coward and 200 members of the Sheffield Choir. From accounts received from Melbourne and Adelaide the scheme appears to be warmly welcomed by members of the great Commonwealth.

In that charming book of gossip entitled 'Dickens and his Friends,' recently published, we notice that the writer has repeated from the pages of Forster's biography a little piece of sentimentality which might well have been spared. We allude to Dickens's account of how, during his early struggles (1824), he was taken to the Royal Academy of Music to see his sister receive a prize for her musical studies. 'I could not bear to think of myself—beyond the reach of all such honourable emulation and success. The tears ran down my face,' &c., &c. This was because—his parents being in sore pecuniary need—young Charles had to assist the family finances by pasting labels on blacking-bottles for six or seven shillings a week. This anecdote, we say, might well have been spared, because close inquiries show the too-ready tears of the great author to have been imaginary ones. Prizes were few at the Academy in those days, and the rather full records of the early proceedings say nothing as to Fanny Dickens having distinguished herself at all during her career in Tenterden Street.

But for another reason we must regard this as a piece of mere sentimentality. Our memory supplies us with numerous instances of children of artistic proclivities who have been obliged to work at the most uncongenial and deplorable labour, instead of having their heart's desire; but for the honour of English manhood we can say that we never knew one boy or girl who whined and reproached their parents therefor as Dickens did. We remember a violinist, now well known, who had no means of earning the money for his education but by blacking his face and spending all his summer holidays as a 'nigger' on Ramsgate sands. And we remember a now eminent soprano singer who, nearly all through her student career, was acting as maid of all work in a lodging-house kept by her mother. This plucky girl actually cleaned the house-steps and blacked the boots before she went to her singing-lesson. And when her teacher remonstrated with her for the terrible condition of her hands, she explained the cause as if it were quite a joke. Which is, we hope, the way a genuine lady would regard it.

The two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Italian composer Pergolesi occurred on January 3. He was born at the village of Jesi, near Ancona, and died in Pozzuolo at the early age of twenty-six years. He is best-known to posterity by his 'Stabat Mater' and the opera 'La Serva Padrona.' This event has been celebrated in a practical way by the formation of a Pergolesi Society in Munich, under the auspices of Herr Ludwig Schlitter, who has made a special study of this composer's life and art. The aim of the Society is to issue new publications of Pergolesi's most important works, to edit a Monograph (which is now in preparation), and, by artistically correct performances, to arouse public interest not only in this composer but also in the whole Neapolitan School.

The terminological inexactitudes of the musician's vocabulary have often excited caustic comment and stimulated futile suggestions for reform. It seems that we are now called upon to endure a new ambiguity arising from a strained use of the word 'tonal.' 'Tonal fugue' we understand, and the word 'tonality' we also flatter ourselves has a definite meaning. But the exigencies of describing a peculiarity of the new French school, as exemplified more or less by Debussy, have brought into being the expression 'tonal scale' to distinguish a scale of whole tones. Why not plain and self-explanatory 'whole-tone scale'? We do not call the everyday and more or less effete diatonic major scale a tonal and half-tonal scale.

In the Christmas number of a well-known Vienna paper, Richard Strauss has related some reminiscences of his acquaintance with Brahms and Hans von Bülow. At a concert in Berlin, Bülow introduced Brahms to those present in the artists' room as the composer of 'The Tenth Symphony.' Brahms, not feeling very comfortable at Bülow's praise, said it gave him a sensation 'as if one had got pepper in the eyes.' In 1885 the master was present at a concert of the Meiningen Court Orchestra, at which the second conductor, Richard Strauss (Bülow was conductor-in-chief) directed a performance of his own Symphony in F minor. Brahms expressed a lukewarm opinion about the composition, calling it 'quite pretty' (ganz hübsch), adding: 'Young man, you might look at Schubert's dances and try to invent simple eight-bar melodies.' An amusing incident occurred when Brahms conducted his 'Academic overture.' On this occasion, Bülow and Strauss played the kettledrums, &c., but as they were unable to count the silent bars they were continually lost. One cannot resist the feeling that the effect of the wrong entries may have suggested much to at least one of the players.

Dr. James Lyon, of Liverpool, issued an unusual Christmas card to his friends. We are glad to be able, with his consent, to reproduce it. Whether the fact that the music can be read either way up conveys any suggestion as to the effect of Christmas festivities, Dr. Lyon does not say. The construction of the piece is certainly ingenious.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS.

Reforms in musical notation are perennially proposed. The most recent ideas in this direction are those of Mr. Stanley Hawley and Mr. Ernest Austin. The former promises new editions of popular pianoforte classics in which time-signatures are altered and new key signatures adopted, when modulations are fixed, and other alleged simplifications are added. There is no doubt much to be said for the scheme, and it deserves to succeed. It is stated that all variations from the original text are intentional, but this would scarcely apply to that shown in the second complete bar of this edition of Chopin's Nocturne in F minor. Mr. Ernest Austin has published (through Messrs. Larway) some songs which are not barred. This plan no doubt has some recommendation in its application to subtly phrased music, but in other cases it provides one more puzzle for a Hawley to unravel someday.

Mr. Benjamin Burrows (private tuition) has passed the University of London Intermediate Examination in Music, and Mr. John David McClure (Trinity College of Music) has passed the examination for the degree of Doctor of Music. The examiners were Dr. J. C. Bridge and Dr. P. C. Buck.

DR. EDWARD HAROLD DAVIES ON MUSIC IN AUSTRALIA.

Dr. Edward Harold Davies, of Adelaide, who is spending a short vacation in England, is the elder brother of Dr. Walford Davies. He was born in Oswestry on July 18, 1867, and went to Adelaide, Australia, in 1886. He returned to England in 1890, and during his stay of several months passed the examination for the associateship of the Royal College of Organists. On his return to Australia he graduated as a Bachelor of Music at the University of Adelaide, the examiners for the exercise being Sir Frederick Bridge and the late Sir Herbert Oakeley. He paid a second visit to England in 1900, and three years later he passed the Mus. Doc. degree examination at the University of Adelaide, Sir Hubert Parry being the examiner for the exercise. His was the first Doctorate of Music conferred by an Australian University. Dr. Davies is the founder and present conductor of the Adelaide Bach Society, to the work of which reference is made below.

Dr. Davies discourses fluently and optimistically of the condition of music in Australia. Questioned as to the taste and capacity of the people generally, he states that visiting artists declare that they get in the various towns audiences as discriminating and intelligent as they do anywhere else on their travels. There can be no doubt that the Australians, as a nation, are temperamentally disposed to music. Although there is not a large leisured class in the community able to devote attention to the art, the number of students in proportion to the population is very great, and good teachers are numerous. The climate is especially favourable for singers. Australia has already contributed materially to old-world art, in that she was the birthplace of Melba and Ada Crossley, and in course of time bids fair to rival Italy as a land of song.

Two Universities have established Chairs of Music. Professor J. Matthew Ennis, Mus. Doc. London (1894), has the chair at Adelaide, and Professor Franklin Peterson, Mus. Bac. Oxon., has that at Melbourne. The University of Sydney provides no chair. This is to be deplored, inasmuch as this influential University is the oldest and wealthiest of Australia's educational institutions.

The existence of established Chairs of Music is proving a factor in the advance of the art, and in this connection interest is lent to recent discussion upon the expediency of Australians depending upon the examinations held by the Associated Board (London). Although the value of an imprimatur from so highly esteemed a body is appreciated, it is now felt that the Commonwealth itself can furnish competent expert examiners. A scheme for the conduct of music examinations under the aegis of the Federated Universities of Australia and New Zealand has so far taken shape as to ensure joint action between Melbourne and Adelaide, which two Universities are already in co-operation in the conduct of examinations of a very high standard.

In the large towns the taste for the practice of music finds its vent in the formation of choral and orchestral Societies. At Sydney the Philharmonic Society, formerly under Signor Roberto Haron (whose work was fully described in the Musical Times of August, 1908), and now successfully conducted by Mr. Joseph Bradley, late of the Glasgow Choral Union, is one of the most prominent of several good musical organizations. In Melbourne, under the direction of Mr. Marshall Hall, orchestral performances have contributed largely to musical education, and the Philharmonic Society, under Mr. G. Peake, has distinguished itself notably by performances of Elgar's 'Apostles' and 'The Kingdom.' In Adelaide the Society under the direction of Mr. C. J. Stevens (who was formerly associated with the Birmingham Musical Festival), has during the last twenty years done excellent service in publicly performing the standard oratorios.

One of the chief achievements of Dr. Davies's career in Adelaide has been, as stated above, the establishment of the Adelaide Bach Society. It consists of a picked chorus of one hundred singers, all of whom have satisfactorily passed an examination in sight-singing, vocal ability, and quickness of ear as ascertained by power to imitate fluently. Dr. Davies finds that old tonic sol-fa pupils who have applied their skill to the staff notation are among his best readers. The works performed by the Society during the last few years include 'St. Matthew Passion' (Bach), which has been given twice, 'Hiawatha' (Coleridge-Taylor), Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Mozart's 'Requiem' Mass, three of Bach's cantatas, and notably Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius.' Madrigals and modern part-songs are also practised for their own sake, and because they help so greatly the development of refined performance.

The 'Dream of Gerontius' was performed last October twice in three days. The preparation was extraordinarily painstaking, and the production was an unqualified success. The audience showed intense appreciation, and there were numerous requests for a third performance. There is no permanent orchestra in Adelaide, but there are many excellent performers on orchestral instruments at the theatres and elsewhere. These were gathered together and separately rehearsed for the great event. As recorded in our December, 1909, issue, no fewer than 150 rehearsals (sectional and united) were held. On the whole, excellent results were attained by rather more detailed attention than is usually devoted to the orchestral sections.

The greatest interest is being taken in a projected visit of the Yorkshire Festival Chorus, 200 strong, under Dr. Henry Coward, which it is expected will take place next year. In Australia, as in England, competitive meetings are rife and, together with many other influences, have already reacted in the direction of growing musical enthusiasm and development.

It is not difficult to gather from Dr. Davies's conversation that there are great potentialities for the Art of Music in the Antipodes, and it is satisfactory to know that with men of force, insight and ability, like Dr. Davies, at hand, the great Commonwealth is entering upon its natural inheritance.

MR. JOHN HEDLEY.

RETIREMENT FROM THE SECRETARYSHIP OF THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Many thousands of choralists and other musical folk now living, who at some time have been brought into contact (in the pleasant sense) with Mr. John Hedley, will feel more interest than surprise on hearing that in the 77th year of his age he has decided to retire from the Secretaryship of the Royal Choral Society. An adequate account of Mr. Hedley's career would involve a history of all the vicissitudes and triumphs of that great Choir, for Mr. Hedley has been intimately associated with it from its inception. But only a brief sketch of the work of the Society and Mr. Hedley is possible here.

MR. JOHN HEDLEY.

(Photograph by J. Russell & Sons.)

It was probably largely owing to the early vocations of Mr. Hedley that he was able to adapt himself so thoroughly to the needs of the Society. Obviously only a born organizer, a wily tactician, a firm disciplinarian, trained to obey and to exact obedience, could expect to cope with the multifarious duties and heavy responsibilities that devolve upon the business management of a concert-giving body of 1,000 performers.

Mr. Hedley was born at Woolwich, on January 21, 1834. It is not necessary to dwell upon his boyhood and early youth, which brought him more or less into association with Army influence. The first important work of his life was his service in connection with the Medical Department throughout the whole of the Crimean War, from 1854 to 1856. Here he made first-hand acquaintance with the gruesome side of war, stripped of its glitter of honour and glory. No doubt the work had its compensations in the knowledge that it mitigated so much human suffering. That he emerged from this test of fortitude with unimpaired energies was a tribute to his remarkable physical constitution and his moral fibre. Three highly-prized medals testify to the appreciation of his services by the powers-that-were.

On his return from the war he was appointed to a clerkship at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. Before long he became chief clerk, and altogether he was with the Academy for seventeen years. In 1872 he resigned his post and entered upon what has turned out to be the most important work of his life. The Albert Hall Choral Society was established early in that year. The first meeting of the newly-formed body was held in Exeter Hall on February 5, with Charles Gounod as conductor. A miscellaneous concert, patronised by the late Queen Victoria, was a financial success, but later concerts were disastrous, and the failure led to the resignation of Gounod. In November, Sir (then Mr.) Joseph Barnby was called in, and Mr. John Hedley came on the scene as general superintendent. An arrangement was made in conjunction with Messrs. Novello to give a series of concerts. These were only moderately successful financially, but they nevertheless led to the trial of one of the boldest concert schemes ever before, and since, ventured upon in this country. Supported by guarantors and the Council of the Albert Hall, Messrs. Novello undertook the responsibility of organizing nightly choral and orchestral concerts. After seven weeks' trial the enterprise, although artistically and educationally successful, had to be abandoned on financial grounds, the loss amounting to £6,000. Later, in 1876, an influential committee, including the Duke of Edinburgh amongst its number, watched over the interests of the Society, and it was at this stage that the organizing capacity and exceptional experience gained by Mr. Hedley became so invaluable. All the details of the intricate business arrangements gradually fell into his hands, and the Society, under the skilful conductorship of Sir Joseph Barnby (who, it should be remembered, was one of the finest of choir trainers, even when measured by standards of to-day), took a high place amongst the musical institutions of the country. In 1882, Mr. Hedley was the recipient of a testimonial from the members of the Society. The address, which accompanied a purse containing £150, included the following paragraph:

How much of the success of the Choir and of the enjoyment of its Members is due to the unflinching patience and courtesy with which your, often difficult, duties have been performed, it is not possible to estimate, neither is there any need: while we believe that your musical knowledge has lightened your labours, and has imparted to them that enthusiasm which is begotten of devotion to the Art for its own sake, we are sure that with all these alleviations the calls which your office has made on you have always been engrossing, and your labours such as could only be successful when under the influence of much tact and forbearance.

The work of the Society went on smoothly until Sir Joseph Barnby died in January, 1896. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted the remainder of the season's concerts, but he was not a candidate for the vacant post. Sir Frederick Bridge was soon after elected conductor. He directed his first concert on October 29, 1896, and, as we all know, he still occupies that honourable position.

It is an extraordinary testimony to Mr. Hedley's sense of duty and bodily constitution, that he never missed attendance at a rehearsal, concert, or an examination of candidates for admission to the Choir. During his connection with the Society he has heard every one of the seventeen or eighteen thousand candidates for admission. The Choir at present consists of 250 sopranos, 180 contraltos, 180 tenors, and 250 basses. A curious fact, that provokes interesting speculation as to the why and wherefore of things, is that there is a much greater percentage of married ladies amongst the contraltos than amongst the sopranos. Is it that, as a class, contraltos are more marriageable than sopranos, or is it that their husbands find it easier to dispense with their company?

The organization of the Choir includes sixteen gentlemen superintendents, all of whom are honorary. Mr. Hedley speaks very warmly of his cordial relations with these indispensable officials, and of the value of their assistance. He describes them as the pillars of the Society.

Although Mr. Hedley has given practically his whole time throughout the year to the business of the Society, he has also been concerned in many important Royal Albert Hall functions—Royal, National, and Masonic. One of the most important events with which he had a great deal to do was the installation of His Majesty The King (then H.R.H. The Prince of Wales) as Grand Master in 1875. Mr. Hedley is one of the oldest Past Masters of the Craft, and is Past Assistant Grand Director of Ceremonies of the Grand Lodge of England.

In a speech made at a recent rehearsal, when his retirement was announced, Mr. Hedley said:

'I have resigned! Need I tell you what this means to me—the severance of so many ties of real friendship and the happy association of so many old and dear friends? I can only add the hope that in my retirement you will continue to bear me in kind remembrance, and you may be assured that so long as it may please God to spare me I shall never cease to watch over the Society's progress and to hold you all in affectionate remembrance.'

It need not be added that these simple words, with their ring of sincerity, evoked an affecting demonstration. The Choir sang the only national song we possess (albeit the tune is French) for use on these warm-hearted occasions. So, with the organ turned on at the main, and under the baton of Sir Frederick Bridge, the Choir rolled out 'For he's a jolly good fellow.' And so say all of us, and may Mr. Hedley enjoy the tranquil evening of the day of life well spent, until the night falls and the next day dawns.

(Photograph by J. Russell & Sons.)

The new secretary is to be Mr. W. G. Rothery, a gentleman who has literary and musical gifts and organizing skill that will fit him for the not too easy task of following Mr. Hedley. Mr. Rothery has had wide experience in the administration of choral societies, and for many years he has conducted the City of London College Choir. He has also dabbled in dramatic matters. One of his plays was produced at the Scala Theatre a year or two ago, and recently he wrote an operetta entitled 'Lucette,' which was set to music by Mr. W. McNaught, junior, and produced privately with great success. Mr. Rothery's translations of songs are largely used in this country.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

THE REPORT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE COMMITTEE (DECEMBER, 1909).

The publication of the Report of the Committee appointed by the President of the Board of Trade in March, 1909, to advise the Government generally upon any alterations that may be required in British Copyright Law for the purpose of giving effect to the Berne Convention as revised at Berlin in November, 1908, suggests an inquiry with the object of ascertaining to what extent the rights of composers are likely to be affected by the various clauses of the Revised Convention, and in what manner the Report of the Committee proposes that those clauses should be dealt with by the British Legislature.

It is hardly necessary to remark that the Convention in the form in which it was revised at Berlin can have no force of any kind in this country until the British Legislature has adopted it, in whole or in part, by passing an Act of Parliament to make it the Law of the land. The appointment of the Board of Trade Committee was the initial step towards the drafting of the necessary Bill which the Government will introduce in due course; and, as the Revised Convention contains a provision for its ratification at Berlin not later than July 1 prox., it follows that the attention of the new Parliament must at a very early stage of its career be directed to the passing of the Bill, which should be drafted without delay.

For the purposes of this article it is not necessary to survey the whole field of Copyright which engaged the attention of the delegates at Berlin. It will be sufficient briefly to call attention to the comparatively few points which are likely to interest and be of use to musicians, and in doing so it will be convenient to state firstly what is the present Law under the Original Berne Convention of 1886 (as amended at Paris in 1896), secondly what are the alterations which have been made by the Revised Convention of 1908, and finally what course the Board of Trade Committee recommends with reference to those alterations.

The following are the five main points which seem to call for consideration in dealing with the subject within the suggested limitations:

1. The regulation of the enjoyment and exercise of the International rights.
2. The Term of Copyright.
3. The right of Translation.
4. The express reservation of Performing Right.
5. The Composer's rights as against the reproduction of his works by means of so-called records, and with regard to their performance by mechanical instruments.

1. At the present time a work first published in any one of the countries of the International Copyright Union cannot enjoy Copyright in any of the other countries of the Union unless the work has complied with all the conditions and formalities prescribed by the law of the country in which it was first published.

The Revised Convention on this point makes a drastic alteration. The administration of the present law in each country of the Union necessitates an inquiry, often very difficult to carry out, into the administration of the laws, and a knowledge of the laws themselves, in a large number of other countries. To remedy this the Revised Convention ordains that for the future the exercise and enjoyment of these International rights are not to be subject to the performance of any formality, and that such exercise and enjoyment are to be independent even of the existence of their protection in the country of first publication. So that the extent of protection as well as the means of redress secured to the composer for safeguarding his rights are hereafter to be governed exclusively by the Law of the particular country in which he is claiming protection for his work.

The Report of the Committee favours this alteration, and if it is adopted by the Legislature the result will be that a French composer seeking to assert his rights in England before an English judge will no longer be driven to prove that his work is entitled to copyright in France; it will be sufficient if he satisfies the English judge that his work is entitled to protection according to the Law of England, i.e., the work will be treated in England as if it were in all respects an English publication.

2. The Term of Copyright.—There is a very considerable variation in the length of the term of Copyright amongst the several countries who are parties to the Berne Convention, with the result that there is a material want of reciprocity in the concessions made to foreign publications according to the laws of some of the countries. German Copyright lasts for the composer's life and thirty years. French Copyright lasts twenty years longer. Consequently a German publication seeking protection in France would appear to acquire twenty years longer protection there than a French publication would secure in Germany. To remedy this inequality the present Berne Convention provides that the protection granted in the other countries must not exceed the duration of the protection granted by the Law of the country of first publication.

The Revised Convention, however, aims not only at equality, but also at simplicity, and boldly suggests that there should be one uniform period of Copyright for all countries, and that that period should be for the life of the composer and fifty years after his death.

The Report of the Committee, by a large majority, recommends the adoption of this period by Great Britain, and it further recommends that, as regards all Copyright publications published under the existing Law, the benefit of the extended period shall belong substantially to the composer and not to anyone to whom he may have already assigned his Copyright.

3. The exclusive right of Translation under the existing Berne Convention and the Paris Amendment of 1896 belongs to the author for the whole term of his Copyright in the original work, subject to the proviso that the right is to cease unless, within ten years from the time of the first publication of the original work, he has caused to be published in any country of the Copyright Union, a translation in the language of that particular country.

The Revised Convention abolishes this proviso, and makes the right of translation co-extensive in every way with the Copyright in the original.

This alteration is also approved of by the Committee.

4. The reservation of Performing Right.—The English Law requires that as regards all musical compositions published since August 10, 1882, any Copyright owner who desires to reserve his right of public performance must notify the fact by printing on the title-page of his work a notice to the effect that he reserves the right. The Berne Convention of 1886 also requires a notice of a similar character to be printed on the title-page or commencement of the work, as a condition for securing international Performing right.

The Revised Convention does away with the necessity of making any express reservation of the right, and the report of the Committee suggests that this alteration be adopted by the English Law, not only for International but for National purposes also.

5. Mechanical Instruments.—The English Law as interpreted in the case of Boosey v. Whight, in 1900, recognises no right in a Composer to control in any way the reproduction of his composition by mechanical means, although it is pretty generally assumed that he could interfere to stop a public performance of his work on a mechanical instrument. The Berne Convention of 1886 also provides that the manufacture and sale of instruments serving to reproduce, mechanically, music in which copyright subsists, is not to be considered as constituting infringement of musical Copyright.

The Revised Convention gives to composers the exclusive right to control the adaptation of their works to instruments which can produce them mechanically, and also the public performance of their works by means of such instruments, and it leaves to each country the right to make its own reservations and conditions as to the application of the Law in its own territory.

The American Legislature recently passed an Act which, while granting to the composer the absolute right to prevent his work from being adapted for use by mechanical instruments, also compels him, if he once grants a licence to anyone to make such an adaptation, to throw his composition open to anyone else who wishes to adapt it for any other instrument. This Act, moreover, provides for a fixed Royalty to be paid to the composer by the manufacturer or manufacturers of the record, whenever the composer has once licensed the adaptation of his work, and the Royalty is fixed at the magnificent sum of two cents per record, whatever the length or value of the record may be, and however good or bad the composition may be.

A great effort was made by numerous witnesses, who gave evidence before the Board of Trade Committee on behalf of manufacturers of the mechanical instruments and records, to induce the Committee to recommend the adoption of the American system of so-called 'compulsory licence,' and the witnesses were generally willing to concede the composer's right to control his work, as against the mechanical instruments and records, provided he was bound by Law to withhold his licence entirely, or, if he exercised it, was obliged to throw it open to all manufacturers in consideration of a fixed Royalty. By a majority of fifteen to one the Committee decided to recommend that the composer's rights should be absolute and uncontrolled by any conditions.

The Report further recommends that, as the right proposed to be conferred upon the composer must be presumed to be a newly created right, it should enure to the benefit of the composer and not to the benefit of any assignee to whom he may, before the proposed new Copyright Law comes into force, have assigned his Copyright.

A commendation is also made that the Revised Convention, which, subject to certain conditions is retrospective in its operation on all works which are still copyright in the country of first publication at the time when the Revised Convention takes effect (July 1, 1910), shall not operate to revive any expired rights. Consequently the sole right of translation which may have been lost through failure to provide a translation within the ten years limit, or a performing right which may have been lost through failure to reserve the right by a notice on the title-page, either under the Act of 1882, or under the Berne Convention of 1886, will not be revived, even though the Revised Convention in other respects will be applicable to the publication to which those rights were capable of being attached.

The Report makes one other suggestion of no little importance to composers, although it concerns National rather than International Copyright, and the Law of Contract more than either. Musicians may be surprised to learn that the sale of the Copyright of a composition subject to a Royalty is regarded at Law as a personal contract between the vendor and the purchaser, and that the covenant by the purchaser to pay the Royalty does not run with and attach to the Copyright in the hands of any subsequent assignee who acquires the Copyright from the original purchaser. The purchaser may part with the Copyright in the usual course of business, or, in the event of his bankruptcy or insolvency, the trustee would take over his interest for the benefit of the estate of the bankrupt. In the former case the second purchaser and in the latter case the trustee in bankruptcy would be under no liability of any kind to account to the vendor for the Royalties. Whatever claim the vendor might have would be against the original purchaser from him, a claim which in the event of that purchaser's bankruptcy would often be of no value at all.

The suggestion made by the Committee, with a view to provide a remedy for this injustice, is that any Amending Act should confer upon the composer the right to enforce the payment of his Royalty against any person who holds an assignment of the author's right.

THREE 17TH CENTURY SETTINGS OF THE LITANY.

BY WALTER G. ALCOCK.

The singing of the Litany has always made its appeal as a particularly beautiful and appropriate use of the art of music as an aid to worship. I have memories of years ago when, in Wells Cathedral, I heard Tallis's setting sung to perfection. The atmosphere of the place, the view of the kneeling priest and choir, and the gentle conflict of sound which reached the listener in the nave of the beautiful church, are possessions I cherish with reverent affection. There were a few deviations from the original Tallis, which had become traditional, but to my mind these were justified by their effect.

There can be little doubt that the varied traditions which obtain in most cathedrals should be sedulously and jealously guarded. Seldom does one listen to the services in our cathedrals without noting important variations in unimportant details. These have been handed down in much the same way as have the dialects of the people. But though it may be differently expressed, the meaning is unchanged.

It has been the custom at Lichfield Cathedral for many years to sing in rotation five different settings of this beautiful responsive prayer, viz., the Ferial, and those by Tallis, William King, Loosemore and Wanless. The esteemed organist of the cathedral, Mr. J. B. Lott, has most carefully edited the three last named. A short description of each will interest many readers, and may lead to their wider adoption. These Litanies are now published by Messrs. Novello in octavo form, with an interesting historical preface by Mr. Lott.

The first example is by William King, son of George King, who was organist of Winchester Cathedral until 1665. He was appointed a lay clerk of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1648, and took Holy Orders in 1652, besides filling other important posts. His setting of the Litany was originally in B flat, forming part of a complete service, but it is published in A. King gave no part for the priest, nor are the suffrages included. It is, then, necessary to use the Ferial setting in both cases.

The music of the first four petitions is quoted below. The effect of the gradually rising treble part will be noticed :

PRIEST.

O God the Father, of Heaven : have mercy upon us mis-er-a-ble sin-ners.

CHOIR.

O God the Fa-ther, of Heaven : have mer-cy up-dim.

on us mis-er-a-ble sin-ners.

dim. p

The next response is fully in keeping with the supplication preceding it :

CHOIR.

Spare us, good Lord.

The response to the succeeding eight petitions also ends on the tonic :

CHOIR.

Good Lord, de-liv-er us.

The following then serves for the remaining responses, and ends on the dominant :

CHOIR.

We be-seech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

The beautiful setting of the words 'Grant us Thy peace' is also worth quoting :

CHOIR.

Grant us Thy peace.

There remain five responses, into which variety is introduced, and these end King's setting, the remainder being sung to the Ferial use.

I have some sympathy with many who question the use of the word 'Festal' when applied to a Litany, on the ground that this devotional exercise is in the deepest sense a penitential and humble supplication. That view is well illustrated in the setting by Henry Loosemore. This musician was appointed organist of King's College, Cambridge, in 1627, and graduated Bachelor of Music there in 1640. His services were retained, with those of the lay-clerks, during the time of the Commonwealth, and he died in 1670.

Loosemore's use of the key of D minor seems more in keeping with the character of the Litany, as will be seen from the examples. He gave no priest's part, but this has been admirably adapted by Mr. Lott from the Ferial setting, by simply changing the key to D minor. The response to the first petition serves also for the second, but after the third and fourth some change is made. The last is a beautiful example :

PRIEST.

O holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, three } God : { have mercy } mis-er-a-ble sin-ners.
Persons and one } upon us

CHOIR.

O ho-ly, bless-ed, and glo-ri-ous Tri-ni-ty, three Per-sons and one God : have mer-cy up-

mis-er-a-ble sin-ners.
on us mis-er-a-ble sin-ners.
mis-er-a-ble sin-ners.

A most pathetic sentence of four triads furnishes the next response, and it is (except as to the arrangement of the parts) an exact copy of Farrant's setting of the words 'For Thy goodness,' which conclude his beautiful anthem 'Call to remembrance.' It may or may not have been intentional :

CHOIR.

Spare . . us, good Lord.

The next example :

CHOIR.

Good Lord, de-liv-er us.

is amplified and extended in that which succeeds it :

Chorus.
We be-seech Thee to hear . . us, good Lord.
We be . seech Thee to hear us, good Lord.
hear us, . . good Lord.
We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

At the words 'Son of God' a striking effect is made by the use of the chord of B flat :

Choir.
Son of God ; we be - seech Thee to Thee to hear . . us.
hear . . us.

Of the remaining responses I quote the following :

Choir. that ta - kest a - O . . Lamb of God, that . . ta - kest a - that ta - kest a - way the sins of the world ; Have mer - cy, ta - kest a - way the sins of the world ; Have way the sins of the world ; Have
way the sins of the world ; Have have mer - cy up - on us.
mer - cy, have mer - cy up - on us.
mer - cy, have mer - cy up - on us.
mer - cy, mer - cy up - on us.

and that immediately preceding the Lord's Prayer :

Choir.
Lord . . have mer - cy up - on . . us.
Lord . . have mer - cy up - on . . us.
Lord . . have mer - cy up - on . . us.
Lord . . have mer - cy up - on . . us.

The remainder is sung to the Ferial setting.

The setting by Thomas Wanless (appointed organist of York Minster in 1691) is another example of the use and appropriate effect of the minor key. It is in C minor, and a point of great interest lies in the priest's part, which is original and strikingly varied. The opening phrase and the response are as follows :

PRIEST.
O God the Fa-ther, of Heaven : have mer-cy up-on us mis-er-a-ble sin-ners.

Choir.
O God the Fa-ther, of Heaven : have mer-cy up-on us
mis-er-a-ble sin-ners.

Mr. Lott points out the remarkable similarity (though in the minor key) of both these examples to Pelham Humphrey's 'Grand Chant,' the priest practically taking the bass. In spite of the somewhat monotonous treble part, the music is of a truly penitential character. Until the words 'O Christ, hear us,' there is not much which calls for remark, but the remainder of the setting is so fine that I give it in its entirety, again drawing particular attention to the priest's part :

PRIEST. O Christ, hear us.
Choir. O Christ, hear us.

PRIEST.
Lord, have mer - cy up - on us.
Choir.
Lord, have mer - cy up - on us.

PRIEST.
Christ, have mer - cy up - on us.

Choir.
Christ, have mer - cy up - on . . us.

PRIEST.

Lord, have mer - cy up - on us.

CHOIR.

Lord, have mer - cy up - on us.

The Ferial use, as in King and Loosemore, completes Wanless's setting.

The examples given will, it is hoped, stimulate a desire for the adoption of these settings as a relief to the regular use of the Ferial Litany. A change is often beneficial in more closely directing the attention of the choir to the importance and meaning of their duties.

I have already referred to the prefaces written by Mr. Lott, and again desire to acknowledge my indebtedness to him.

MEMORIAL CONCERT.

The concert given on January 24, at the Queen's Hall, in memory of the late Mr. A. J. Jaeger, was a remarkable tribute from leading composers and executants to a unique personality. Mr. Jaeger was little known to the general public, but his circle of intimates included nearly all the prominent musicians concerned with the three great streams of British art, the creative, executive, and critical.

The programme presented on this occasion was chosen with fine taste. It was as follows:—

- | | |
|---|---------------------------------------|
| Overture to an Unwritten Tragedy | C. Hubert H. Parry. |
| (Conducted by the COMPOSER.) | |
| Rhapsody for Alto Voice and Male-voice Choir (Op. 53) | Brahms. |
| Miss MURIEL FOSTER. | |
| Choir from the Alexandra Choral Society. | |
| Four Songs from Cycle, The Long Journey (Op. 25) | Walford Davies. |
| Mr. PLUNKET GREENE. | |
| (Conducted by the COMPOSER.) | |
| Variations on an Original Theme (Op. 36) | Edward Elgar. |
| Ballade in A minor | S. Coleridge-Taylor. |
| (Conducted by the COMPOSER.) | |
| Three Songs from a New Cycle (Op. 59, Nos. 5, 3 and 6) | Edward Elgar. |
| (First time of performance. Conducted by the COMPOSER.) | |
| Miss MURIEL FOSTER. | |
| Hans Sachs' Monologue (Die Meistersinger) | Wagner. |
| Mr. PLUNKET GREENE. | |
| Overture | Die Meistersinger Wagner. |
| Conductor: Dr. HANS RICHTER. | |

Sir Hubert Parry's Overture was a dignified introduction. The solo in the Rhapsody showed that Miss Foster was in full possession of her powers. Dr. Walford Davies's songs were presented for the first time with orchestral accompaniment and made a great effect. The greatest interest centred in the new songs by Elgar. All three were sung with great intensity of feeling by Miss Foster. The second one, 'Oh, soft was the song,' was encored, but the deepest impression was made by 'Twilight,' which displays the composer in one of his finest moods. Another item that earned much applause was Coleridge-Taylor's Ballade in A minor, which was written by the composer in his nineteenth year. There was a very large audience.

The following are extracts from an article on the late Mr. A. J. Jaeger by 'C. L. G.', that appeared in the Spectator (December 25):

He was neither a composer nor a performer, and though he wrote a good deal in the Musical Times and was responsible for the analyses of most of Sir Edward Elgar's principal compositions, his work was largely anonymous, and this fact, coupled with his natural modesty and his delicate health, withdrew him from public notice. Indeed, the only notable recognition that Jaeger ever received in his lifetime was in Elgar's 'Enigma' variations—which are supposed to reflect in music the personalities of several of his friends—where he appears under the alias of 'Nimrod.' No acknowledgment, however, could have been devised more delicately calculated to please his taste than this veiled association with his favourite modern composer. But if the rank-and-file of musicians knew little about him, everybody who was anybody in the musical world knew of Jaeger. 'Nimrod' is as a musical enthusiast who could always be counted on to press the claims of the younger men to a hearing.

The association was mutually advantageous in a high degree. Jaeger on his side was glad of regular work which, even in its most 'drudgical' aspect, was at least bound up with the art which interested him more than anything else, and during the last ten years of his life brought him into touch with a number of distinguished composers and musicians. When their works were passing through the press, Jaeger's intelligence and sympathy rendered him an invaluable intermediary, and he enjoyed special facilities for attending festivals and concerts as the representative of his firm. On the other hand his employers were singularly fortunate in securing the services of a man who was not only zealous, industrious, and efficient, but also a tremendous enthusiast, keenly sensitive to new developments, and a persona gratissima with the leaders of the musical world. Of the taint of commercialism there was not a trace in his character. He may have overestimated the talent of some of his idols, but at least he never extolled mediocrity or inanity. For many years he struggled bravely against the ravages of 'the captain-general of Death,' as an old writer called consumption, until in 1908 he found himself no longer able to stand the strain of office work, and was reluctantly obliged to retire on a pension. These latter days were often sadly clouded by physical weakness. There were times when, as he put it, he was a thorough-going Schwärzseher; when he envied those 'who had so much work to do and were strong enough to stand the strain'; when all that he could hope for was that music might raise him from the Inferno of hopelessness to 'some gentle, stimulating Purgatory.' But these black moods did not affect the sweetness of his disposition, and there were brighter days when he took long walks with his children, or managed to get to a Queen's Hall Symphony Concert. 'Elgar's Symphony,' he wrote a year ago, 'has been a perfect godsend to me, for it has made me forget for a few happy hours that I am a doomed man.' He was happy in his friends, happier still in his home life, and when his summons came he met it with an uncomplaining fortitude. 'He loved his life, though not of death afraid,' and the last wish that he expressed to his devoted wife was that she should write to his friends and bid them all good-bye for him.

The services that Jaeger rendered to many of the British composers of to-day cannot be easily overestimated. For these services were not confined to a liberal interpretation of his official duties and responsibilities as the representative of a great publishing firm. He was an indefatigable propagandist and proselytiser. All that he wrote and said was animated by a heartfelt sincerity, and the only thing that disappointed him in his friends was when they failed to share his enthusiasms. His attitude was not judicial. Music either left him cold or filled him with ecstasy. But he always contended that the newcomer should have the benefit of the doubt until he was self-condemned. 'It is only fair,' he once wrote of a much-discussed modern work, 'to extend to the composer that goodwill with which all amateurs must approach the greatest works of the classics (including our beloved Brahms) if they wish to enjoy their music. They take the quality of the classics for granted and go to enjoy them. A modern composer is abgeschlachtet (butchered) after one hearing.' Yet though perhaps overprone to praise, he was by no means uncritical. If he spoke more of the moderns, it was because he felt that they were in more immediate need of encouragement, and that he gave them without stint. Yet when it came to a downright comparison, he would temper his lauds of the living with such frank admissions as : 'He's not a Wagner. He's not a Brahms.'

But his foreign upbringing in no way biased him against the kind of hisid opinion. Indeed, latterly he spoke with regret of the vitiation of musical taste in Germany, and the enslavement of modern composers to that over-exacting mistress—the orchestra.

Jaeger's letters were like the man,—sincere, outspoken, impulsive. They show the pathetic, patient fight with disease, but they also reveal an enthusiasm as unflagging as 'G.'s' at its biggest,—another really great amateur. 'I think Jaeger's secret,' writes one of his closest friends, 'himself one of the most distinguished of our younger composers, 'was his unflinching ear for the emotional signs in music. From that point of view alone, he could register how much vitality there was in a new work. His defects in judgment arose from the same cause. He believed in a piece if it made him feel like tears. But he did not only bid for emotion. He demanded noble effort and sanity, and sometimes came to hate that which had once moved him, but subsequently showed its over-emotion. His help to young composers was marvellous. If he gave us overpraise, he tempered it with much candid criticism.'

Men so charged with emotion are not often practical, but, by a happy anomaly, Jaeger did not allow his romance to interfere with routine. Musicians are often terrible egoists, but Jaeger was an eminently unselfish enthusiast. Despondent about himself, he was full of hope for others, and spent himself in smoothing their path to fame.

Church and Organ Music.

CAROL SERVICES.

The popularity of the Christmas carol, and the growing and intelligent interest in its performance, becomes more pronounced as each Yuletide dawns upon us. From its former employment in the open air, as an invitation to contemplate the story of the Nativity of our Lord, the Christmas carol in many churches to-day has so advanced as to become almost a necessary adjunct to the services at this season. And such an occasion seems to possess attraction for many who would find little interest in other forms of musical setting. No doubt the simplicity and conciseness of design have much to do with this, together with the deep conviction of, and sympathy with, the great truths involved.

That a large congregation can and will sit reverently listening to the performance of Christmas carols is in itself a good thing. But we go further, and claim that it lends strong support to our conviction that equally reverent silence might be exhibited by the congregation while such parts of our church service as the Psalms and Canticles are sung by the choir. We take leave to think that if a member of the congregation at a carol service attempted to sing, his exertions would, as a rule, meet with scant appreciation. But we perhaps take too much upon ourselves, and therefore will be content to remain among the execrated few who think that it is as reverent to listen as to speak, especially when others express, so much better than we can ourselves, what we have in mind.

It may be doubted whether the church offers the best possible conditions as a place for performance. There is in the four-part carol more than a suggestion of the hymn-tune, and all that pertains to it, quite foreign to the carol proper, which in its truest form tends to freedom of rhythm and to variety. The sound of the organ, too, is foreign to the circumstances under which the carol was originated and developed.

However this may be, we thankfully and gladly note that the Christmas season of last year again afforded an opportunity of presenting the beautiful story of the Birth of Christ. Carol services were held in many churches and secured very large congregations. One of the most notable was that at Westminster Abbey on Monday, December 27, when in place of the anthem at evensong a selection of Christmas carols was rendered by the Abbey choir. An interesting and important detail lay in the fact that most of the carols were of ancient origin. We say this, as it seems that the true carol 'ring' is best obtained from examples of those from the older sources, although the characteristics of tradition are well maintained by some present-day writers. In this respect Sir Frederick Bridge has proved himself more than usually successful, and his setting of the late Dean Farrar's beautiful lines commencing 'In sorrow and in want,' is convincing as music of this special kind. A beautiful rendering of 'In dulci jubilo' was given, and among other striking examples was that entitled 'A Babe ys borne I wys.' It was taken by Sir Frederick Bridge from a sixteenth century MS. in the library of the Abbey, and really consists of a concise account of the Life of Christ, from His Birth to His Ascension. Others sung on the occasion were the traditional 'When the crimson sun had set'—a real carol, which gained in effect by being given by four solo voices with a full refrain—'Good King Wenceslas' and Sir Frederick Bridge's 'As on the night before this happy morn.' The Abbey was crowded by a reverent and attentive congregation, who joined in the singing of the last verse of the final carol, 'The first Nowell.' An equally attractive selection was also, according to custom, given in the Abbey on Holy Innocents' Day, December 28, when there were few, if any, vacant seats.

Other carol services were given at St. Saviour's Cathedral, Southwark, the Foundling Hospital, St. Stephen's Church, Shepherd's Bush, &c.

ST. PAUL'S ECCLESIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

A paper on 'The popular aspect of Plainsong' was read by the Rev. Albert E. Briggs at the Chapter House, St. Paul's Cathedral, on November 24 last.

The lecturer was optimistic in his belief that plain-chant would soon be more appreciated, as the only music canonically authorised by the Church. The revival of plainsong was due, in the first instance, to the Tractarian movement, but Continental corruptions were too often taken as models. Now, however, thanks to many enthusiastic experts, practical rules had been formulated. The scope of plain-chant was all-embracing, in its simpler forms, for the village choir; while its more ornate melodies provided interest for the most fastidious. The lecturer divided his subject into three heads, viz., 'The priest and plain-chant,' 'The choir and plain-chant,' and 'The congregation and plain-chant.' He also gave ideal renderings of the priest's part, and a small choir, under the direction of Mr. Edmund Goldsmith, gave examples of the Anglican chant, Helmore's method of pointing, the 6th century Creed, a Christmas Magnificat Antiphon, and many other interesting selections, from which the lecturer sought to prove the superiority of plain-chant over later developments. A discussion ensued, and it is interesting to know that the lecture will be followed by others connected with the Arts of the Church, by Mr. T. G. Jackson, R.A., Professor Lethaby, and others.

YORK MINSTER CHOIR SCHOOL.

The following are the results of the York Minster Choir School in the December (1909) examinations in harmony, musical history, and theory of music of Trinity College of Music, London. Maximum marks in each division are 100. Candidates must obtain at least 60 marks for a 'pass' certificate, and 80 marks for an 'honours' certificate.

For the seventh consecutive year all the candidates from the above school have gained 'honours' certificates.

Intermediate Division.—Frederick R. Shepherd, 99 marks; William R. L. Maynard, 97; Sidney Peel, 97; Charles D. Heaton, 94; John Waterworth, 92; Cecil John Buckland, 89; Harold F. Spencer, 87.

Junior Division.—William Pink, 98 marks; Joseph F. Plummer, 97; Frank O. Hodgson, 95; Thomas W. Robertson, 93.

Preparatory Division.—John W. Breckon, 100 marks; Wallace H. Pink, 100; Cecil W. Hamilton, 97.

Mr. Edwin H. Lemare has been fulfilling a number of engagements in England since his return in October, and leaves for the United States in February, where he has many recitals to give in addition to the superintendence of the building of organs to his design. He has, we understand, charge of the erection of the large instrument for the Town Hall in Auckland, N.Z., the builders being Messrs. Norman & Beard.

SPECIAL MUSICAL SERVICES.

An impressive rendering of Brahms's 'Requiem' was given in Perth Cathedral on December 19th, under the direction of the organist, Mr. Stephen Richardson. The soloists were Master L. Battersby, of Mr. Bates's Choristers' School, London, and Master Rayner Reid and Messrs. Stuart and Attwell, of the cathedral choir. Mr. David Stephen, Dunfermline, played the organ admirably, and there was a full orchestra. The choral portions of the work were most efficiently given by the cathedral choir, supplemented by Mr. Richardson's Choral Society. The greatest credit is due to all concerned for having produced the work, which is not widely known in Scotland, while a special word of thanks must be given to Mr. R. F. McEwen, of Dupplin Castle, who originated the idea, assisted at the rehearsals, and made himself responsible for all expenses.

At Harringay Congregational Church, Green Lanes, on December 12, at the close of the evening service, the choir sang Mendelssohn's settings of Psalms 42 and 13. The soloist in the first-named was Miss A. Josephine Clayton, and in the second Miss Lena de Nicheroy. The choir-master was Mr. Charles Rowley, and Mr. Harry E. King played the organ.

Gounod's 'Gallia' and Cuthbert Nunn's 'Everyman' were sung at St. James's Church, Clerkenwell, on Sundays, December 12 and 19, under the direction of Mr. Seymour Dicker. The solo in the first-named work was sung by Mrs. C. J. Parker, while Messrs. Mewburn Levien, J. Marficani and G. F. Withers, and Miss E. Gomila, were responsible for the solo numbers in 'Everyman.'

The Troon Parish Church Choral Society gave a performance of 'The Messiah,' in the church, on December 29, under the conductorship of Mr. A. Dinsdale. The soloists were Miss Chrissie MacDiarmid, Miss Crué Davidson, and Messrs. Adams and Sharp, the latter being principal bass of Carlisle Cathedral. There was a professional string band, under the leadership of Mr. Richard Daeblitz, and Mr. P. A. Black presided at the organ. It should be added that Mr. R. Finnie McEwen, the Society's president, most generously defrayed the expenses of the performance.

A selection from 'The Messiah' was given at Portsmouth Parish Church on Sunday, January 2, under the direction of Mr. R. H. Turner, the organist and choir-master.

An orchestral service was given at Brixton Church on January 2, when Beethoven's second Symphony and Mendelssohn's Violin concerto were performed. There was a full orchestra, Mr. F. Weist-Hill being principal violin, while Miss Audrey Richardson was the soloist in the concerto. Mr. Douglas Redman conducted, and Mr. Welton Hickin was at the organ. We note that Gounod's 'Mors et Vita' is promised for February 6, at 3.30.

On January 3, in Monkwearmouth Parish Church, Handel's 'Messiah' was rendered. The church choir of fifty voices sang the choruses, and the soloists were Miss Gertrude Todd, Mrs. R. W. Waddle, Mr. F. Bailey and Mr. R. W. Waddle. The accompaniments were played on the organ by the organist and choir-master of the church, Mr. R. F. Jarman.

On January 12, the Milford-on-Sea Choral Society gave in the Parish Church a performance of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' (Parts 1 and 2). The following were the soloists: Mrs. Beesley, Mr. R. W. Beesley, and the Rev. Mr. C. H. Collet, the Vicar. Miss Majorie Bruce played the organ, and gave as a Postlude an excellent performance of Bach's Toccata in C. The orchestra was led by Mr. Bertocini. Mr. C. F. Abdy Williams was the efficient conductor.

After nearly fifty years' work as organist of various churches in the neighbourhood of Stockport, Mr. Charles Swain, on Sunday, December 19, acted for the last time as organist of Stockport Parish Church. The service was fittingly closed by the singing of a hymn to music of Mr. Swain's composition. Advantage was taken of the occasion before leaving the vestry for the presentation of an illuminated address from the choir, and a handsome volume from the bell-ringers. An item of interest is that, mainly through the retiring organist's influence, a tablet has been erected in the church to the memory of John Wainwright, well known as a former organist there, and composer of the tune to 'Christians, awake.'

 Mr. W. Sidebottom, organist and choirmaster to the Parish Church, Stockport.
 Mr. K. W. Tyson, organist of Christ Church, Woking.

Reviews.

Hymns Ancient and Modern, Historical Edition, with notes on the origin of both Hymns and Tunes.

[W. Clowes & Sons, Ltd.]

The appearance of this large and handsome volume is a testimony to the increased interest manifested in recent years in the history of the hymns used in our churches, and of the music to which they are sung. Formerly, editors and compilers of hymn books were, as a rule, notoriously indifferent and careless in this respect, and the information given was frequently either inadequate or entirely misleading. This is specially true in regard to the music. The most glaring absurdities as to the composers or sources of tunes were often repeated in book after book, without, apparently, the slightest attempt to verify or correct the statements so made. The publication, in 1892, of Dr. Julian's great 'Dictionary of Hymnology' no doubt gave a powerful stimulus to the study of the subject, and at the same time provided a splendid basis for subsequent research; and the issue in recent years of several other works dealing with hymns and hymn tunes has helped to make it possible, in the words of the preface to the present work, 'to give a more satisfactory account than could have been given a few years ago' of the history of both hymns and tunes.

The present volume is distinguished from such works of reference as have been alluded to by the fact that it is not merely a manual of information to be used as a companion volume to a particular hymn book, but that it is a complete edition of the hymn book itself, with historical, biographical, and bibliographical information added, thereto. The student has therefore the advantage of having before him in the same volume, even on the same page, both text and commentary.

The hymns are printed as in the ordinary music editions of the collection, with their accompanying tunes, including the thirty-eight alternative tunes issued as a supplement shortly after the first publication of the new edition; and following each hymn are exhaustive notes supplying information, first relating to the hymn, and then to the tune or tunes.

In regard to the translations of the ancient Greek and Latin hymns, which form a large proportion of the collection, the notes are particularly full and valuable. Every effort has been made to settle their authorship (often a matter of great difficulty), while interesting information is given as to the place which each hymn occupied in the worship and Offices of the Eastern and Western churches. It should be noted also that a feature distinguishing this from the ordinary editions is that here the original text of the hymn is given alongside of the translation. The more modern hymns are no less carefully and interestingly annotated. Besides the name of the author, information is given as to the circumstances under which the hymn was written and the publication in which it first appeared. In addition, the texts of the hymns are subjected to careful scrutiny, and any variations which the original has undergone are duly noted.

To readers of the Musical Times, the notes on the music will no doubt appeal with special interest, and it may be said at once that students of the subject may accept with the utmost confidence the information here given. Evidently no pains have been spared to secure accuracy even in minute details, and those who have worked in this field of research know how difficult it is to attain to this result, and how many and various are the pitfalls which entrap the unwary. In the case of the plain-song melodies belonging to the ancient hymns it is probably not too much to say that the facts as to their origin, history and usage are here for the first time placed before the ordinary reader in a simple and handy form. The tunes which are derived from the early French and English Metrical Psalters are very fully annotated, and the numerous quotations of the original settings of these tunes cannot fail to interest musicians. Attention may be specially called to the harmonised settings of the old psalm tunes published by John Day in 1563. Of these, about a dozen are given in full, and they afford most interesting evidence of the skill of our native musicians of the period. In the notes to the numerous tunes derived from German sources, the original form of each melody and the words to which it was set are quoted, and in most cases a reference is given to the exhaustive work on German Protestant Hymn-tunes by Johannes Zahn, where fuller information on the history of the tune may be found. The information given as to the English tunes of later date is equally precise and thorough. The name of the composer, the date of publication, and, where ascertainable, the words for which the tune was originally written are all duly recorded. The researches of recent writers have cleared up many obscurities in this region, but as noted in the preface there are still some hymns and tunes about whose origin the last word has not been said. A notable example of this is the well known Christmas hymn 'Adeste fideles,' and its equally well-known tune, of which neither author nor composer has yet been identified.

In addition to the annotations appended to each hymn, the volume contains a most valuable historical introduction, extending to about a hundred pages. This has been contributed by the Rev. W. H. Frere, an acknowledged expert on the subject. In this introduction the entire history and evolution of hymnody in the Christian Church are brought under review, with the object of showing in their historical sequence the movements and developments in the worship of the Church which have yielded the material embodied in the present collection. The introduction is divided into twenty sections. Beginning with the 'Hymnody of the Early Church,' and the first hymns of the Greek and Latin churches, the writer proceeds to discuss in some detail the monastic cycles of hymns, the Office hymns of the mediæval period, and the later Latin hymns, mainly those from the French Breviaries of the 17th and 18th centuries. A most interesting section then follows, devoted to the plain-song hymn melodies. This not only deals with the origin and history of the melodies, but also gives a clear exposition of the structure of these tunes and the manner in which they ought to be sung. Passing on to the Reformation period, an excellent account is given of the various stages in the production of that 'Old Version' of the metrical psalms, popularly known as 'Sternhold and Hopkins,' which held the field in England until the beginning of the 18th century, and did not entirely disappear from use till quite modern times. A full description—with carefully compiled statistics of the contents and facsimiles of the title and another page—is given of the first complete edition of the work, printed by John Day in 1562. The same careful and accurate treatment is accorded to the later editions of the book having special musical interest, such as those connected with the names of Damon, Est, Allison, Ravenscroft, and Playford. After sections devoted to the German chorales and the 'New Version' of Tate and Brady, the contributions of Congregationalism and Methodism are discussed, with special reference to the work of Isaac Watts and the Wesleys. The remainder of the introduction is occupied with the numerous collections, especially of tunes, published in the 18th and early 19th centuries, and with the rise and progress of modern hymnody. The closing section deals with the history of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.'

Enough has been said to show the extreme value and interest of this introduction. There is here brought together in the form of a consecutive narrative information which is otherwise only to be obtained from a great variety of sources, and by consultation of numerous works of reference.

At the end of the volume are to be found short biographical notes, alphabetically arranged, of the authors of the hymns and the composers of the tunes; and there is also a plentiful supply of useful indexes, among them being a chronological list of the writers of the hymns and another similar list of the sources of the tunes. The volume is further enriched by a number of facsimiles and portraits.

This summary of the contents of the volume will give some idea of its great importance as a compendium of information—a compendium the usefulness of which will not by any means be confined to those who make use of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' as a manual of church song. The compilers have, by their labours, earned the gratitude of all interested in the study of hymnology, and they have in addition supplied to those who may undertake the production of future hymnals abundance of direction as to the sources from which the best material, both literary and musical, is to be obtained.

VOLIN AND PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Old English Violin Music. Edited by Alfred Moffat. No. 9. Three Pieces for Violin and Pianoforte. By William Boyce.

Norwegian Suite for Violin and Pianoforte. By Emil Kreuz.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

To the already important selection of old English violin music edited by Alfred Moffat, another welcome item has been added, the newest number consisting of three pieces by Dr. William Boyce (1710-1779). No. I. is a crisp Gavotte in F; No. II. a Jigg in B flat, marked Allegro alla caccia and exhibiting rather more tendency to a spirited hunting song than to the lively, catchy jig; No. III. is a Bourrée in D minor with a graceful Minuetto in the tonic major as an Intermezzo. Those who delight in the music of bygone days will find plenty to interest them in this tuneful little Suite by the popular composer of 'Heart of Oak.' The violin part presents no difficulty, and does not exceed the third position. The editing is in every way excellent.

Pianists with a penchant for Norwegian music have a lengthy catalogue from which to draw; but violinists are by no means so well supplied. Especially is there a scarcity of violin music of a moderate degree of difficulty in the Scandinavian style. All the more acceptable therefore is Mr. Emil Kreuz's 'Norwegian Suite.' First we have a delightful little 'Hillside dance,' followed by a 'Reaper's song,' making excellent contrast. A cheerful 'Spring dance' comes next, and then the gem of the Suite, 'The shepherd's lament,' in the strain made familiar by Grieg and other composers of the North. A 'Halling,' the most characteristic dance of Norway, brings the whole to an animated conclusion. The compass of the violin part is kept within that of the first position.

Gluck. Par Julien Tiersot.

[Paris: Félix Alcan.]

This highly interesting book belongs to the series 'Les Maîtres de la Musique,' edited by M. Jules Chantavoine. Gluck was an extraordinary man. He commenced writing for the stage at the age of twenty-seven, but it was not until twenty-one years later, in 'Orfeo ed Euridice,' that he showed mature signs of greatness. None of the works which preceded it have survived, yet in his review of them M. Tiersot points to many fine numbers, as for instance a contralto solo in 'Demofonte,' produced at Milan in 1742, in which, as he remarks, 'the genius of Gluck already appears at its fullest'; and further he tells how many numbers in the great operas which the composer wrote for Paris, were taken, slightly modified, from very early works. In other words, Gluck did not suddenly become a great dramatic composer. When he came to London in 1745, Mrs. Cibber asked Handel his opinion of Gluck's music. The reply was, 'He knows no more of contrapunto as mein cook, Waltz.' Counterpoint was certainly not Gluck's strong point, yet his operas 'Orfeo,' 'Alceste,' 'Armide' and the two 'Iphigenias' are still performed, whereas those of Handel seem to have passed into utter oblivion. In connection with that London visit, the oft-repeated statement that Gluck produced a pasticcio entitled 'Piramo e Tisbe,' a work which, M. Tiersot positively, and with good reason, declares, 'n'a jamais existé.' Gluck has been styled the 'Wagner of the 18th century,' but among certain differences one is very striking. The 'Orfeo' libretto presented to Gluck by Calsabigi caused the composer to adopt his new style, whereas Wagner evolved from his inner consciousness and soul, both poems and music, and from the very beginning. At the end of his book, M. Tiersot sums up Gluck's art-career in a short yet pregnant sentence. It is as follows: 'After remaining during a space of thirty years fettered by a form in which only music was considered, he was set free by the help of poetry; and thus he realised the complete work which has won for him the admiration of the world, and which served as a model for the future.'

PART SONGS.

- The song of Fionnuala.* Irish air. Arranged for mixed voices. By Granville Bantock.
- Kitty of Coleraine.* Irish Air. Arranged for mixed voices. By C. H. Lloyd.
- The comrades' song of Hope.* Adolphe Adam. For men's voices.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

'The song of Fionnuala' is an artistic arrangement for mixed voices of one of Ireland's most beautiful folk-songs. There is some difference of opinion amongst authorities as to the true form of the melody, more especially as regards the use of a G sharp or a G natural (the music is written in the open key). Professor Bantock has chosen to use the version that adopts the G sharp and involves the augmented second in the melody. No matter which version is right, it is obvious that the arranger has provided a beautiful piece of four-part music for the use of choral societies.

The fact that so many good musicians are turning their attention to the arrangement of folk-songs for use in the choral society, is evidence of a certain trend in the direction of appreciation of the wealth that surrounds us. The melody of 'Kitty of Coleraine' has a charming rhythmic daintiness that is increased by the skill of the arrangement. Some very good vocalisation is needed, but the mere notes and time will give no trouble. We imagine that the piece would sound even better a semitone or even a tone higher.

'The comrades' song of Hope' is one of the most inspiring choruses or part-songs ever written for male voices. The music is not of the subtle kind, and it never moans and groans. There is an irresistible swing, or march-like rhythm in the piece that sets both performer and listener aglow. The English words are by J. S. Stallybrass.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Erlebtes und Erträumtes. Composed by Joseph Suk. Op. 30.

Fatum. Klavier-Variationen in B moll. Composed by Christian Sinding. Op. 94.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

The ten pieces by Joseph Suk, published in two volumes under the collective title of 'Erlebtes und Erträumtes,' offer much food for thought to the modern student of harmony, whom they will certainly interest. The composer has an inventive gift, which he exercises in evolving novel chords and progressions. The results occasionally supply an answer to the question 'How can I be ugly?' recently propounded in these columns, but more often they have a strange—if outlandish—beauty of their own. It is worthy of note that but sparing use is made of the so-called 'tonal scale.' In design and idiom the music has a highly individual character. Evidently it was written by no 'prentice hand, but rather by one guided by experience and confidence. All the pieces seem to imply an underlying idea or programme, although in only two cases is a title supplied. The fifth, which ends the first volume, is written 'Zur Genesung meines Sohnes.' It is an Adagio of remarkable intensity and expressiveness. The eighth is the lightest in character and texture and is perhaps the most pleasing of the series. The tenth is entitled 'Den vergessenen Grabstätten auf unserem Dorfriedhofe,' and aptly illustrates the subject.

Sinding's pianoforte variations are founded upon a short subject of dignified character, the sombre hues of which are reflected in the later portions. In its consistency of key and in the nature of its variations, which are connected into one continuous whole, the work approximates to the Passacaglia form. At times one is forcibly reminded of Schumann's methods of harmonization and pianoforte 'orchestration.' In general, however, the style is that of a later period. Some sections are exceedingly florid and demand considerable executive skill. The quieter portions display effects of great beauty and nobility. The dominating atmosphere is one of academic austerity. The variations are twenty-one in number, the last being practically a note-for-note repetition of the subject, but divided into bars of four, instead of three, crotchets.

Obituary.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths:

RICHARD PRESTRIDGE TABB, on January 6, at the residence of his cousin, Dr. Sleeman Tabb, at Herne Bay, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. He was the son of the Rev. Richard Prestridge Tabb, and was born at Mevagissey, Cornwall. He married, in 1875, the only daughter of William V. Goodwin. In the following year he became the partner of the present Robert F. Goodwin, the firm from this time being known as Goodwin & Tabb, then of Great Queen Street. In 1906, the premises being required for the Kingsway improvement scheme, the firm removed to 34, Percy Street, W. Mr. Tabb was for many years solo bass in the choir of the Brompton Oratory, and was also closely associated with many of Sir Henry Irving's important productions at the Lyceum Theatre, he having joined the company in 1882. He soon after undertook the duties of choirmaster, a post he retained until the end of Sir Henry's management. In this capacity he visited America and Canada several times in connection with Sir Henry's extensive tours. During the last few years he had devoted his time and energies exclusively to the business of the Library.

PROFESSOR CARL HALIR, who was known to fame throughout the musical world as the second violin player in the Joachim Quartet, at Berlin, on December 21. He was born on February 1, 1859, at Hohenelbe, in Bohemia. He received his musical education at the Prague Conservatoire and afterwards at Berlin, where he was a pupil of Dr. Joachim. In 1876 he commenced a career that led from orchestral 'leading' and the duties of a concertmeister to the violin professorship at the Berlin Hochschule and the post of principal violin at the Royal Opera. His association with Dr. Joachim as a fellow-artist began in 1897 and lasted till the death of the master in 1907. Professor Emmanuel Wirth is now the only survivor of the distinguished organization.

The Rev. WILLIAM HENRY NUTTER, M.A., at Newport, Isle of Wight, where he was known as the 'Musical Vicar.' Mr. Nutter was a graduate of Cambridge, and was appointed a Minor Canon of Rochester in 1871, retaining that position until 1884. He then became vicar of St. Margaret's, Rochester, and subsequently, in 1890, vicar of St. Paul's, Barton, Newport. Mr. Nutter was for several years conductor of the Rochester Choral Society, and was much esteemed for his musical abilities both at Rochester and in the Isle of Wight.

SAMUEL SIMONS SANFORD, professor of applied music at Yale University, New Haven, U.S.A., died at Yale, on January 6, after a year's illness. Professor Sanford was born in Bridgeport, Conn., on March 15, 1849. After studying pianoforte-playing in the States he went, at the age of nineteen, to France and Germany, and became acquainted with the foremost musicians of the day. His talent was such that Rubinstein declared that if Professor Sanford had had to face the bread-and-butter struggle he would have been one of the greatest artists of the century. He counted amongst his personal friends Rosenthal, Elgar, Paderewski, and many other well known musicians. He did not compose. In 1894 he accepted the chair at Yale, but he habitually returned his salary. He was a liberal and unostentatious patron of musical art and artists, and especially of those in need. He leaves one son and one daughter.

JOSEPH MONDAY, on January 19, aged fifty-eight. He was organist of Holy Trinity Church, Bessborough Gardens, London, W. Many will remember the deceased musician, mainly because of his intimate connection with the St. George's Glee Union, of which for thirty years he was conductor.

A melancholy interest, especially to older members of the musical community, attached to the death of MRS. W. T. BEST, whose remains were interred with those of her distinguished husband in Childwall Churchyard, on December 31. The venerable lady of eighty had survived her husband thirteen years.

MUSIC IN RELATION TO OTHER ARTS.

By DR. H. WALFORD DAVIES.

On January 22, Dr. H. Walford Davies gave at the Royal Institution the first of three lectures on 'Music in Relation to other Arts.' Below we give a summary.

Dr. Davies began by observing that music is constantly connected with other arts in practice. It is coupled with poetry in song, with narrative in recitative, with scenic effect, tableaux, and action in incidental music, and with all these in opera. Lastly, by literary suggestion, it is associated with any or all of them in so-called programme-music, that is, instrumental music with some explanatory poetic, picturesque or dramatic basis. Yet Music's relations to the arts of the poet, orator, painter, and dramatist are not made so indubitably clear up to the present time that a discussion of the subject may not be timely; even utterances which cannot possibly be authoritative or exhaustive may be forgiven if they prove only suggestive. And by some happy chance they may provoke more adequate treatment of the whole question.

Though we may only partly perceive the utility and necessity of the arts in the scheme of human affairs, it must be seen that they are to the very last detail a natural product—the flower of human activity. A tendency to mentally separate Art from so-called practical affairs must be noted. Some class Art as a superhuman matter above our ken, and others brand it as unpractical. The truth is surely clear that man has long found it as natural to hunger in some measure after daily beauty as for daily bread. It is dangerously convenient to oppose the terms 'artificial' and 'natural,' but they form no real antithesis, since the artificer himself is a natural creature and the ingenious man simply follows his instincts. We should more truly relate artistic activity with the rest of human life if we could steadily view mankind from a kind of mental aeroplane. If ants added a crude music to their other accomplishments, would any man in his senses curse these amazing creatures for having ceased to be natural?

As a starting point for a comparison of the arts, he desired to suggest that artistic activity is in every sense of the word natural, and that we are likely to fail to relate the arts to one another, if by some arbitrary line we sever artistic effort from all other natural activities that give us happiness.

The fine arts make their appeal only to the two most refined senses, the eye and the ear. If the arts are the product of natural activity appealing to these fine senses, it may be inferred that homely human nature will peep out from behind them. They are likely to set forth or express (as far as their limitations allow) the familiar characteristics of humanity, as exemplified in ordinary daily life. It had been suggested—he knew not by whom—that all art is a manifestation of the joy of life. In this it merely shares the honours with every healthy activity. Perhaps the greatest characteristic of life is the beneficent joy taken by the creature in the healthy exercise of its every faculty. Anyone can see that this is the chief driving force of the world. Joy is our wage; the Creator pays the creature in this most excellent coin, and when there is enough and to spare we make music of it. Art may be not too fancifully described as man's savings bank, which he has devised in order to put his spare joy out at interest.

Art then is a gratuity in life invented by man for his own and others' diversion, in his spare time, and with his spare ardour. Practical men seem sometimes to despise Art on this very account. But, just as the true nature of a man will be more completely betrayed in the gratuitous use he makes of his spare time than in those pursuits which are dictated by sheer necessity, may not the true nature of humanity at large be more fully revealed in these glorious gratuitous pursuits?

Some would say that refined sensuous gratification is the chief aim of musical art. Then the emotional satisfaction found in a series of solemn chords or an exquisite rise and fall of melody is so great as to lead many to assert that emotion in its turn is the chief faculty to which the art addresses itself. Again, the extraordinary joy experienced in the recognition, apprehension and actual creation of orderly design in tones is strong enough to cause distinguished critics like Hanslick to oppose somewhat bitterly the emotional view of the art, and to champion the intellectual side as the chief, if not the only object. He would venture to suggest that controversy about these appeals is out of place, and that ultimately there will be found in Art man's whole record of his interests in life. To define it as the language of emotion is less than half the truth. It is nearer the truth to call it the language of vital energy.

This inexplicable vital ardour of man in all its aspects—sensational, emotional, intellectual—is undoubtedly regulated by the still more inexplicable will-power that controls our pursuits, the Choosing force (so diversely named by man) which alone gives Art the responsible creative touch, the existence of which, in Bach and Beethoven for example, we can neither deny nor explain.

Let it be, at all events provisionally, granted: (1) that Art is a purely natural human pursuit; (2) that it is gratuitously undertaken by man, for love, in his spare time, with his spare energy; and (3) that therefore it may reasonably be expected to record, reveal, and communicate vital humanity.

From these facts three important deductions may be made. The first is that this human content of the arts will be found to be the great common factor that relates them; in all alike the same human nature will record itself. It is here that their blood-relationship (a term more useful than elegant) may be found. Secondly, any essential differences or incongruities that appear between any two arts will obviously not be differences of content so much as accidental differences brought about by the natural limitations of eye and ear and of the special medium employed by each art. Thirdly, since Art is undertaken for love rather than of necessity, its utterances will only arise when vital ardour rises above a certain prosaic level. Coldness or apathy produce no Art; a lukewarm kettle never sings.

One reminder may be added which seems invaluable for critical thinking on Art, and that is, that there is a two-fold aspect of almost all the arts, except perhaps that of arabesque. There is joy in artistic expression and in what may be termed artistic impression, and these joys, though constantly mingled, are as distinct from each other as action is distinct from contemplation. The first chapter of Genesis conceives the Creator as an artist rejoicing in action and contemplation: 'And God saw, and behold it was very good.'

It constantly occurs to the mind that certain outlines of hills or trees or mere curves are closely analogous to melodic outline. A melody will in this way recall a drawing. Mozart will suggest Raphael, and Michael Angelo Beethoven. Then rhythmic successions will suggest gesture. By tracing these likenesses and determining their limitations it may be possible to discover how kindred arts may be combined, and to detect insuperable flaws in some accepted combinations, and to guess at possible ways such as are fully hinted by men like Debussy, and in the brilliant picture-music of Strauss's 'Don Quixote' and 'Till Eulenspiegel.'

That both light and sound, the two appeals to eye and ear, are unsubstantial is the deepest and greatest analogy of the bare materials of Art. It is true that the pigment and canvas of the painter, the marble of the sculptor, the granite of the architect, are essential, but they have little more to do with the artistic appeal than the horse whose tail goes to make a fiddle bow has to do with the artistic appeal of a Joachim.

It is desirable at this stage to observe the exact difference between substance on the one hand and light and sound on the other. Every substance perceptible to man has five properties: its three dimensions, and location and duration. Failing any one of these it ceases to exist. But light and sound, as has been said above, are not substantial but are simply vibrational, and each needs but four properties in order to be perceived. These are: (1) Intensity, (2) Rapidity, (3) Location, (4) Duration. There is a kindred pleasure to the eye and ear respectively in perception of infinite varieties of light and sound, from the greatest light bearable to the verge of darkness, and from the greatest sound estimable down to the edge of silence. It may now be noted how differently the arts use this medium.

Varieties of duration of pleasure or pain enormously affect the human creature. Persistent sound or light may become terrifying, and an intermittent sound affects us forcibly—hence the power of rhythmic device. Now the chief aural arts—music, poetry, oratory—press duration into service and use it as a third dimension. The chief visual arts do not do so. Of course they have duration, in that they exist; but they do not use it as a means of expression, as a dimension. They are the still arts. Pictures, sculpture, architecture do not vary in time. There they stand for us to behold and enjoy. Next, there is a second significant fact to be noted as to the use made in both departments of the property of location. Neither of them, he thought, actually uses location, the near or far, as a quasi dimension. But both are able to simulate it; the visible arts do it by perspective, the audible arts do it by adroit use of intensity. Thus a remote figure in the background of a picture gives the idea of distance, and is less impressive than one in the foreground. A burning crescendo in music may give us the effect of an object approaching, diminuendo of an object retreating. In the use of duration as a dimension, music and the aural arts generally have a great advantage, for all the overpowering appeals of rhythm are at their service. Time is made of moment. The work of art becomes urgent, fateful; there is a beginning and end to it, and if we miss one moment we may miss its purport. By the use of duration as a dimension music acquires life, pulse, throb, increase of vitality, it lives, it kicks, it struggles, it attains peace, it dies. A picture can suggest all these things by association of ideas. It can suggest rhythm, pulse, a kick, death. But it is a mute suggestion, and there is a sense in which the spectator has to meet it half-way. What does music pay for its advantage in this respect? What compensates the painter for his disadvantage? It has already been hinted how that rise and fall of melody are akin to rise and fall of outline. Let it be noticed that an artist who does not use time as a dimension is independent of time. He has not to recall by memory, nor is he compelled to move on. He can retrace his steps over and over again. He can move backward as well as forward. He may view his whole picture. A musician, on the other hand, is compelled to move forward. Moreover, he perceives only that minute part of his whole work which is in the present. The past moment is irrecoverable, except by memory, the future unheard. He is in the position of a man looking at a passing panorama through a thin crack in a panel.

Next we must note how the twofold appeal to which reference has been made works out to eye and ear. Everyday we express feeling spontaneously in two ways, by gesture and vocal utterance. By these means we relieve our feelings and habitually communicate with each other. But that sound and sign express and evoke feeling is only half the story. The absorbing work of an artist is chiefly concerned with the other half, that of deliberate design, in which, while there is plenty of the mere arduous of life, there is also the superior joy, that of the mind; joy in order, the discernment of order, and the exemplification of order, one may even say the creation of order. [Here Dr. Davies exhibited a diagram showing the genesis and relation of the arts. This diagram we hope to reproduce in our report of the succeeding lectures.]

The two remaining lectures would discuss the relation of music (1) to its companion aural arts, oratory and poetry; (2) to the still arts and with those of gesture and, lastly, he would attempt to investigate its use in combination with many of those appeals simultaneously, as in music-drama and in so-called programme music. At this stage Mr. Jacoby, the violinist, joined Dr. Davies in performing the first movement of Beethoven's tenth Violin sonata. Regarding the music, Dr. Davies remarked that its general contemplation and stillness gave it a close kinship to a beautiful landscape. In its quiet course are to be perceived beautiful curve of line, rise and fall of melodic outline suggesting objects for thought. But even in the scraps of pure arabesque in which Beethoven indulges, one will have felt that the tender emotion of this rise and fall counts for far more than the pattern which it weaves. This is almost a prerogative of music. Simultaneously to fulfil two such fine purposes, so different in themselves and yet so completely compatible, is not given to many human devices in such rare measure, except perhaps to impassioned speech and to song, to Milton's 'Mediges of Heaven's joy,' the 'Sphere-born harmonious sisters, Voice and Verse.'

THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE, JANUARY 3 to 7.

The twenty-fifth Annual Conference of this Society was held at the Hotel Metropole and the Town Hall, Folkestone, on the above dates. About 300 members attended. A dinner was the only function on the first day, and the morning of the second day was occupied with receptions and business, the chairman being Mr. Councillor W. C. Young, the Mayor of Folkestone. It was decided to hold the 1911 Conference at Edinburgh.

The first paper was one by Lieutenant George Miller, M.V.O., bandmaster Royal Marines, on 'The military band in being.' It was intended to be helpful to musicians who are familiar with orchestral scoring but who are unacquainted with military bands; to provide an explanation of certain misleading technicalities; to draw comparisons between the uses and functions of the various families of wind instruments in the orchestra and the same in the military band, and to give some hints on scoring. The paper was a long one, but its incisiveness and raciness and obvious authority gave it sustained interest. After describing the former isolation of the military band and its present more public recognition, Lieut. Miller went on to say that there is no regular formation or instrumentation prescribed by authority, and therefore there are only a few bands which are absolutely alike in every detail. Flutes used to be provided in different keys to suit the keys of the music, but now the Boehm flute is used. As military band music favours flat keys the D flat piccolo has to be recognised. Of the double-reed instruments only the oboe and bassoon are found in the military band, and of the single-reed instruments British bands use the B flat clarinet almost entirely. One or perhaps two small E flat clarinets are also used, and an E flat alto and bass clarinet may be found in large bands. The E flat alto saxophone and B flat baritone saxophone are useful for the 'thumb' parts of the band keyboard. Horns and their uses—the dilemma of the horns, as Lieut. Miller wittily put it—were fully treated. Time was when the rests permitted the player to take a pinch of snuff between whiles, but now, owing to the continuous part-writing for the valve-horn, there is no time for a pinch of snuff or to think of family affairs. The brass family in the military band is the same as in the orchestra except that the trumpet players do not change their crooks but remain a pair in B flat and a pair in E flat (or F). For trombones the slide rather than the valve is preferred. The lecturer was rather scornful as to the valved trombone, and remarked that British orchestras would adopt it, presumably, when they take to fretted violins. The saxhorn family appears to be decreasing in popularity. Speaking of Meyerbeer's employment of twenty-two saxhorns, four trumpets, and one drum for a stage band, Lieut. Miller exclaimed, 'O monstrous! but one half-penny-worth of bread to this intolerable deal of sax!' As to cornets, it may be said that while they are still with us and likely to remain so, players are not autocratic as they were. The flugel or soprano horn in B flat, also known as the B flat bugle, has long been a favourite in English brass bands, and military bands are now awaking to its value as a tone-factor in the soprano department. The serpent and bass horn have both gone, and are not worth trailing after, both having a tone more like an asthmatic cough than anything else. More regrettable is the passing of the key-bugle or Kent-horn and his big brother the ophicleide. He asked why not try conical instruments such as the sarrusophone and saxophone with a lip-reed? Clarinets, the trumpet instruments for which such obbligato parts as in 'Let the bright seraphim' were written, have gone out of England, and the nearest approach to them, so far as he knew, was the E flat soprano of the champion brass band.

A well-balanced military band consists of wood and brass in about equal proportions. In scoring, the arranger should be fair, and give a player only what his instrument can be expected to accomplish. The lecturer then gave numerous practical hints as to details of scoring and manner of writing the score. In composing music for military bands the composer should avoid the greenery-yallery, Grosvenor gallery, foot-in-the-grave kind of music as well as the hypnotic, uncanny, exotic, Venusberg music of the new school, for it is certainly not to the taste of the people, with their natural love of melody and harmony. It was estimated that in Lancashire and Yorkshire alone there were over 4,000 brass bands, including over 60,000 players. 'And yet,' said Lieut. Miller, 'one reads, almost daily, such moans as this: "Until the home in England is musically more widely worthy of respect, what earthly chance is there for the British composer? What we want to see is the awakening of the home. When the home awakens our beloved Art will have a glorious future indeed." Let the man who wrote that go to Yorkshire; he would not see the awakening of the home—but he could possibly hear it, if he were not stone deaf; and as for a glorious future for our beloved Art and (incidentally) the British composer,—there's his chance. It would not do him any good, however, to write that kind of music which is sans melody, sans tonality, sans harmony, sans almost everything; and I caution him that for outspoken, plain criticism the Yorkshireman takes the biscuit, even as for outspoken, decorative criticism, speaking of my own experience, the Royal Marine takes the whole Victualling Yard. It is no use trying any "New French idioms" on either of these; the one would say, at the very least, that it was "all wrong notes"—the other would say, at the very least—more than I should care to repeat.'

Another paper, read on January 4, was that on:

written by the Rev. Henry Carte de Lafontaine and read by Mr. Stanley Hawley. The paper drew attention to the history of the instrument, its famous makers, its treatment in chamber and orchestral music, and to its neglect as a solo instrument. Illustrations from music composed for the viola in the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries were admirably played by Mr. Lionel Tertis.

On January 5, with Dr. Markham Lee in the chair, Mr. Edwin Evans read a remarkably interesting and able paper on:

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF CONTEMPORARY FRENCH MUSIC.

Mr. Evans began by pointing out that many nations have attempted to assert their musical independence in expressing themselves in an idiom of their own. Each in turn had been hampered by lack of continuity of tradition, but in France a great independence had been attained. Contemporary French music is influenced by the developments in painting and poetry. The quality of perfect finish is to be found in the works of all modern composers of the front rank. French composers are now split into two opposed factions, the older being represented by the pupils and successors of César Franck. This school regards two principles as vital. One is the organic construction of a work out of its smallest irreducible unit, the melodic, harmonic, or rhythmic cell, the other is obedience to the laws of key relationship, and the diatonic sequence of basic harmonies. It conforms in essentials to the best traditions, but it does not allow tradition to hamper a search for a mode of diction which shall give adequate expression to aspiration. This was Franck's gospel, and the best of his pupils follow in his footsteps. Of these the most prominent is Vincent d'Indy, the present head of the Schola Cantorum; others now living include Henri Duparc, Guy Ropartz, a somewhat austere symphonist, Pierre de Bérville, and Louis de Serres. Of those who have passed away, mention should be made of Alexis de Castillon, Ernest Chausson, Guillaume Lekeu, and Charles Bordes, who was associated with d'Indy in the foundation of the Schola Cantorum. Gabriel Fauré was a pupil not of Franck, but of Saint-Saëns, but was nevertheless influenced by his association with the former.

A prominent figure in French music is that of Paul Dukas, who is known in England almost exclusively by his

'L'Apprenti Sorcier,' a fantastic orchestral work full of grotesque humour. In spite of a delicate romanticism and a great love of the picturesque, Vincent d'Indy is essentially the type of the intellectual musician. Modern French composers have discovered many hitherto unsuspected devices for increasing the subtlety of their musical diction. As some of these innovations have become associated in the public mind with the opposite school of musical thought, of which Debussy is the most prominent representative, their use by some of d'Indy's pupils has created a certain degree of confusion, as if the line of demarcation were being obliterated.

The attitude of Debussy towards music is exactly the opposite to that of d'Indy and his followers. Not intellectual, but æsthetic effect is his object, and his ideal is the shepherd, the tone of whose reed merges into the landscape. If form there must be, it must depend rather on what painters term 'quantities' than on key relationship or the evolution of musical protoplasm. Neither tonality nor tradition is allowed to interfere with his entire freedom of selection. He maintains no allegiance to any established conventions, though his addition to a limited number of mannerisms would suggest at times that he had substituted others. Debussy aims principally at giving a purely æsthetic sensation of beauty, and in boldly asserting his right to compose music at the dictation of his own musical soul he has rendered some service to the art. He is unquestionably much indebted to Moussorgsky, Borodine, and Rimsky-Korsakoff, and owes his style of composition to the musician last mentioned. Of the two conflicting factions in modern French music, one has inherited César Franck's characteristic contrapuntal methods, which it has logically extended; while the other has developed his harmonic innovations, and notably his treatment of consecutive dissonances. If one is really desirous of identifying every melodic combination of notes with some established scale system, one may as well follow in the footsteps of M. Busoni, who has demonstrated by experiment that the modern musician has 113 different scale systems at his disposal. The reproach is often hurled at modern French music that it is all alike, whereas to those who understand it, its variety is one of its greatest charms.

Illustrations to the lecture were supplied by the Parisian Quartet, who performed two movements from Lekeu's unfinished Pianoforte quartet; M. Yves Nat (pianoforte); and Madame Wilaume Lambert. In the evening a concert of French chamber music, which included compositions by Debussy, Ravel, Chausson, Roussel, and de Séverac, was given by the artists named.

On January 6, under the presidency of Mr. J. W. Pearson, Dr. H. H. Hulbert read a paper on:

VOCAL PSYCHOLOGY AND PHONOLOGY.

The lecturer began by stating that vocal culture and physical education are absolutely dependent upon the due regulation of breathing, and have also so many points in common that it is quite time for all who are interested in vocal culture to be fully alive to the dangers attending the overlapping of these two kindred subjects. Unless the voice authorities bestir themselves, they will find that the important question of breathing has been settled for them by the physical educationists.

Breathing exercises are systematically taught to the young in nearly all our schools and, feeling as strongly as he did that the latest instructions issued by the Board of Education for the guidance of the teachers in schools cannot but have a pernicious effect upon children's voices, it was clearly his bounden duty to make use of this golden opportunity to point out to such a representative body of voice-trainers the dangers of allowing imperfect breathing methods to be generally adopted without challenge.

The rapidly growing attention that is being paid to the study and teaching of the important subject of phonetics is gradually becoming another danger to voice-trainers. Musicians must assuredly find out what is necessary to make speech and song musical from a phonetic point of view, otherwise they will sooner or later have to accept the decisions arrived at by those who are solely interested in the pronunciation of standard English. This science of music in voice may be called vocal phonology, and is very nearly as important as breathing for voice.

The scientific teaching demanded in vocal culture, in the widest sense, merited a special name to differentiate its function. He suggested the term 'Euphonetics,' to define the musical pronunciation of standard English in song and speech.

The basis of success in vocal phonology (by which is meant musical pronunciation) is the artistic shaping of the articulatory apparatus, and the control of the breath while making sound in these shapes, especially the control in the shapes of the six chief Italian vowel sounds—oo—oh—aw—ah—ay—ee; each of these important shapes possesses its own particular harmonies, which are lost unless the shape is correctly formed; the control of the breath in the well-formed shapes produces musical sounds.

To say that the musical voice of the Italian is due to the perfect pronunciation of his musical vowels is more likely to be true, than to attribute it to climatic condition; if it were really a matter of climate, musical speech or song would be utterly impossible in this country, with its changeable weather. The English language can be made quite musical by paying attention to the correct pronunciation of its vowels in speech and song; it is a language that is full of grit because of the effective arrangement of the consonants in the formation of its words. The music of the English language may be said to be dependent upon the Italianisation of its important vowel sounds.

There are two distinct methods used to obtain this control over the vocal mechanism: the scientific and the artistic. The one begins at the beginning and is safe and sure, the other begins at the end and is uncertain; the one begins with breathing, and the other with expression. The artistic temperament is of the greatest utility if properly applied, but is answerable for much mental pain and anguish if not kept within reasonable bounds.

Persistent and intelligent daily work is capable of overcoming even almost insuperable difficulties; emotional outbursts of energy may be showy, but it is the steady work that tells. Many possess a valuable artistic temperament, which remains latent until they have overcome by hard work special individual difficulties which prevent them from having the means of expression.

Vocal psychology includes the effect of this mental control upon the production of the voice, for it is impossible to get any result worth serious consideration from the working of the whole or any part of the vocal apparatus unless the muscles that move the different parts are made subservient to the will.

After describing some complex physiological actions, Dr. Hulbert went on to say that the practical outcome of these scientific investigations seems to be that the voice-trainer should not only have the clearest conceptions of what he has to teach, but that he should learn how to teach it; otherwise he may make mistakes even at the very beginning; mistakes that may have lifelong effects upon the pupil. It necessitates a little more care and patience to insist upon the right method being learned at first when the highest centres are employed and the act is a voluntary one, and to see that the right method is persistently practised so that when the lower centres control the automatic movements, they will still be properly performed, although apparently done unconsciously. A careless teaching of the individual fundamental movements at the beginning results later in imperfectly performed automatic acts, which are very difficult to eradicate or unlearn.

It is necessary that the action of the vocal apparatus be analysed and its different functions and movements studied in an orderly manner. No part of the body can be hurriedly made elastic. First of all it is necessary to find out exactly what has to be done, secondly to learn the simplest and readiest way of getting it done, and thirdly to teach that way in such a manner that the pupil understands exactly what is expected of him, so that the daily practice may become efficacious.

The last day, January 7, was devoted to social enjoyment.

On the whole the Conference was regarded as a very successful one, but it was saddened by the recent death of Professor Prout, who was one of the most regular attendants at the Conference, and who had endeared himself to all members by his ability and personality.

ENGLISH MUSIC IN ROME.

An orchestral concert given in the Corca at Rome on January 6 by the Royal Academy of Santa Cecilia, mainly for the purpose of bringing works of English composers before the public, was an unqualified success. The programme included Elgar's Symphony in A flat and Stanford's 'Irish' Rhapsody. Mr. Landon Ronald, who conducted, made a very great impression. The Italian newspapers write glowingly both of the music and the excellence of the performance. The following are quotations from the criticisms:

Il Messaggero.—The Symphony is one of the greatest and most genial works which can be found to-day in the productions of any country. The abundance and development of melodic ideas, originality of harmonic combinations, richness and force of the instrumentation, and unity of conception, combined to produce a profound impression on the audience, which applauded with conviction and enthusiasm. The Rhapsody is rich in original melody, and is developed and orchestrated with great skill.

Giornale d'Italia.—Landon Ronald gave proof of his experienced technique, preparing a programme new to the orchestra in four or five rehearsals. He conducted with complete mastery and, we should note, a sober beat, and with correctness of gesture. Elgar's Symphony is a grand work. It takes its place in the first rank of contemporaneous symphonic productions. The Irish Rhapsody has rich, varied, and brilliant instrumentation. Landon Ronald has rendered noble service to the art of his country.

La Tribuna.—Elgar's Symphony is truly a grand symphonic composition. It has a magnificent unity of conception which is very rarely found in a work of such great dimensions. If the melodic ideas are not of great originality they are always nobly and broadly developed, and the working out is absolutely masterly. It is a noble manifestation of art. The Rhapsody is elaborated with taste and elegance and orchestrated with skill.

The 'Peer Gynt' Suite, of Grieg, and Wagner's 'Kaiser-marsch' were other items, the performance of which under Mr. Ronald caused great enthusiasm.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

Only tried and familiar music was included in the programme of the New Year's Day Concert. The noteworthy point was that Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted, and that the chief work performed was Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, which he was the first to introduce into England, at a Philharmonic Concert given in 1894. Many readings of the Symphony have been heard in London since that occasion, but few in which a more impressive effect was obtained without recourse to exaggeration. Mr. Ben Davies sang Wagner excerpts, and Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Onaway! awake, beloved.' The remainder of the programme consisted of works by Tchaikovsky and Wagner.

At the concert given on January 15, Mr. Henry J. Wood made his first appearance since his bereavement, and was accorded a reception that was intended to show how deeply the audience sympathised with him. That this expression of regard and sympathy took the form of applause that grated on all sensitive minds, merely illustrates the inadequacy and conventionality of the means of expression of feeling possible to audiences. The programme comprised seven pieces, and was too long both for the endurance and convenience of the audience. A newly-written overture to 'Everyman' (Walford Davies), which was conducted by the composer, was followed with profound attention. The significance, earnestness and consistency of its treatment mark it as one of the most mature works of its industrious composer. Concerto No. 24 in C minor for pianoforte, by Mozart, was beautifully played by M. Raoul Pugno. The work is not engrossingly interesting, and much the same may be said of Haydn's Symphony in E flat, known as the 'Philosopher.' Sibelius's 'Valse Triste' is evidently much liked by some listeners, but we imagine that this appreciation arises more from the touching character of the programme basis than from any exquisite treatment by the composer. Indeed the ideas are by no means exalting. Bach's vivid 'Brandenburg' Concerto No. 5, in D, for pianoforte, flute, violin and strings, was a welcome relief. This was followed by no less a contrast than Debussy's prelude 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' in which piece the composer exemplifies so happily most of his well-known characteristics. The last piece was the symphonic poem for pianoforte and orchestra, 'Les Djinns,' by César Franck, and to many present this was the greatest attraction of the concert. It is a deeply interesting work of a composer whose claim to attention and fame is only now beginning to be conceded. It was finely performed by all concerned. M. Raoul Pugno was again the pianist, and again he displayed his duly restrained and controlled virtuosity.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert given at the Queen's Hall on January 17 derived great interest from the fact that M. Wassili Safonoff was the conductor. It says much for the genius of this maestro that he was able to impart fresh attraction to Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony. The notable feature of Safonoff's interpretation was its grip and intensity. The slow movement especially was impressive. A novelty in the programme was a new Pianoforte concerto in D composed by Hans Huber, a Swiss musician, who is director of the Basle Music School. The new work did not make a very favourable impression. It contains some graceful and fanciful writing, especially in the opening Passacaglia movement; but on the whole there are seldom ideas that arrest the attention, and there is much that can only be described as weak and commonplace. Herr Lochbrunner, who was the soloist, displayed considerable technique, but his forte touch was hard and over-accented. Other items in the programme were Mozart's overture 'Il Seraglio' and Tchaikovsky's overture 'Romeo and Juliet.' The latter work was finely played. Its passion and colour stimulated M. Safonoff to display his powers at their best.

At the concert given in Covent Garden Theatre on January 23, an interesting novelty was produced—a Nocturne for orchestra, by Mr. Henry Coates. This proved to be a remarkably melodious and attractive composition, displaying originality and imagination, and under the skilful direction of M. Safonoff was so much to the liking of the audience that it was repeated.

THE GIRLS' SCHOOL MUSIC UNION.

At a meeting of the Girls' School Music Union, presided over by Dr. Somervell, held at the Notting Hill High School on January 15, Dr. H. P. Allen, of New College, Oxford, read a paper on 'Responsibility in choice of music.' There was a good attendance of members and friends, who followed Dr. Allen's remarks with acute professional interest. The lecturer addressed himself to the question mainly from the point of view of the teacher of the pianoforte, although he said he could not claim any very large acquaintance with the problems which such teachers had to face. But as an examiner in music he confessed that he was constantly confronted with this thought: 'How far are these students on the right road to become really intelligent musicians?' He admitted that a very large number of children who learn music ought never to touch a pianoforte, except, perhaps, to dust it; but that it was futile to prevent parents from considering their children born musicians, and impossible in most cases to tell with certainty that any given child had musical gifts until she had been taught for a considerable time. This made the teacher's task a particularly difficult one. Dr. Allen thought that the teacher's responsibility in the choice of music to be studied had not always been fully realised. He assumed that the main object in teaching music was to create musicians who, by their powers of interpretation and technique, were able to give pleasure to themselves and also to their hearers. He felt confident that those who could give themselves pleasure would always outnumber those who could give pleasure to others. In teaching, the important thing was to associate the sounds of the instrument with those of the voice, and to induce recognition by both eye and ear. The development of musical sense should have more attention than the learning of pieces. Dr. Allen said that there were five considerations affecting the choice of music:

(a) the ability of the performer; (b) the individual tastes of pupil and teacher; (c) parents; (d) examinations; and (e) concerts. Of these the first was the most important, and the impression of the teacher's taste must be strong. As to parents, if they quarrelled with the choice of music, he suggested that either the child should teach the parent, or the parent the child. He thought that Mozart's music formed as good a nucleus as any for the teacher's purpose. He also inclined towards the works of Couperin and Scarlatti. The inventions of Bach and Haydn's Sonatas were also of immense service. As regards class-singing he favoured unison songs and part-songs for equal voices, and he would make folk-song singing compulsory by law.

A short discussion followed, to which Dr. Somervell and several of the members contributed. A full report of Dr. Allen's paper is given in this month's School Music Review.

There was a reception in the evening at the School, when the guests were received by Miss Steele, head-mistress, and by Miss Mixer, the co-secretary of the Union. A programme of music, arranged by Mr. Walter Ford, was much enjoyed by those present.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

Vienna, January 15, 1910.

On December 17 the Imperial Opera at last presented the long-expected reproduction of the 'Meistersinger.' The performance on the whole proved more enjoyable to the ear than satisfactory to the eye. Director von Weingartner had prepared the musical part of the production with great care. The parts were in the hands of the best artists, and by his refreshing tempi the conductor infused new life into the orchestra. On the other hand, scenery, costumes and stage management left much to be desired, to say nothing of their not being always in accordance with Wagner's own directions. Despite these shortcomings, the work met with an enthusiastic reception, and frequent repetitions are taking place before crowded houses.—The Volksoper has been very successful in the revival of an older work, viz., Halévy's 'Jüdin' (La juive). Herr Simon, the director of the institution, conducted an excellent performance of the music, and, in addition, the opera was staged brilliantly and in the right style. All the musical institutions are preparing festival performances in honour of the veteran composer, Karl Goldmark, whose eightieth birthday will occur on May 18. The Tonkünstler Orchester has already given a concert, at which Goldmark's Symphony in E flat, the Violin concerto, the 'Sakuntala' Overture, and excerpts from his operas were heard. The master, who was present in the directors' box, was the object of enthusiastic ovations.

A concert under the conductorship of Herr Schalk, at which many members of the Court and the aristocracy were present, took place in the Grosser Musikvereinsaal on January 12, for the benefit of the Tuberculosis Sanatorium 'Alland.' Paderewski (who kindly gave his services) came to Vienna specially for this concert. He played Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto in E flat, and afterwards gave as encores brilliant performances of pieces by Mendelssohn and Chopin. Another interesting feature of this concert was Beethoven's 'Kleine Messe' in C major (Op. 87), of which an excellent performance was given by the Singverein, the Philharmonic Orchestra and a solo quartet consisting of Mesdames Nordewier-Reddingius, Kraus-Osborne, and Messrs. Senius and Kraus.

The Gesellschaftskonzert on January 5 proved especially interesting, through the production of a valuable novelty—a large cantata in two parts, 'Aus dem Buehe Hiob'—by the Austrian composer, Herr Karl Prohaska, who with this work greatly enhanced his reputation. On the same evening the Portuguese violoncello virtuoso, Señor Pablo Casals, made a sensation with his playing. At his own concert, which followed shortly after, he showed himself to be a violoncellist of the very first rank, particularly by his playing of solo sonatas by Bach.

RICHARD VON PERGER.

MUSIC IN MELBOURNE.

On Friday, November 26, of last year, Madame Melba laid the foundation stone of the new Conservatorium of Music which is being erected by the Government of Victoria in the grounds of the University of Melbourne. For nine years the work of the Conservatorium, with its growing necessities and steadily-increasing number of students, has been carried on in the building which was formerly the National Museum. The new building, with a suitable concert hall, which, when completed, will have cost about £7,000, has been well designed to meet the developments of many years to come, and presents several features of interest, notably a new experiment in providing sound-proof walls. The Chancellor of the University (Sir John Madden, G.C.M.G.), in presiding at the ceremony, paid a very warm tribute to Madame Melba, who has so unreservedly offered advice and assistance to young singers during her short three months' holiday in Victoria. She has conducted a special class at the Conservatorium, at which students selected by the Director have had the privilege of regular instruction from the great singer, and that without fee, and the Chancellor, both on this occasion and later at the Town Hall concert, very happily expressed the great debt of gratitude which the Faculty of Music in the University owed to Victoria's distinguished daughter.

In his annual report to the University Council, the Ormond Professor of Music (Mr. Franklin Peterson) referred to the provision for a new Conservatorium, to the actual and official adoption of 'normal pitch' throughout the State, and the operations of the Act providing for the registration of teachers as the realisations of his three great ambitions as a servant of musical education in the State.

Normal pitch was adopted by the University and the Government two years ago, and all institutions under Government control—State Schools, Continuation Schools and Training Colleges—use it. The University Orchestra and also the Marshall-Hall Orchestra have complete sets of instruments specially provided by English manufacturers at normal pitch, and all the chief Secondary Schools and educational institutions, as well as private teachers, have agreed to conform to the standard.

The regulations for the registration of music teachers require, as the 'knowledge' qualification, Grade I. (Practical and Theoretical) of the Local Examinations or an approved examination equal in standard. Candidates must further attend approved classes in 'Pedagogics' and, finally, pass an examination conducted by three examiners approved by the Registration Board.

The annual concert of the University Conservatorium was given on Tuesday, December 14, before a crowded audience in the Town Hall.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

On January 3 the usual New Year performance of the 'Messiah' took place at the Royal Albert Hall. The performance presented no new features; the selection of choruses was that usually adopted, and Handel's original accompaniments were again used. The soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. Lloyd Chandos and Mr. Watkin Mills. Berlioz's 'Faust' was revived for the concert given on January 20, and attracted and interested a fairly large audience. The work gave to the choir many opportunities for dramatic singing. The feature of the performance was Mr. George Henschel's singing in the part of Mephistopheles. The other soloists were Miss Perceval Allen as Margaret, Mr. Ben Davies as Faust, and Mr. Bertram Mills as Brander. Mr. H. L. Balfour was the organist and Sir Frederick Bridge conducted.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

The London Trio gave their third concert of the season at Aeolian Hall on January 11. The concerted works performed were Schubert's Trio in E flat (Op. 100) and Rubinstein's Trio in B flat, and the interpretations were as usual distinguished by fine unity and other qualities of excellence. The members of the Trio appear in turn as soloists at these concerts; on this occasion the task of performing alone fell upon the pianist, Madame Amina Goodwin, who carried it out with ability. Songs were contributed by Miss Florence Shee.

At the music-meeting of the London Chamber Concert Association, which took place at Messrs. Novello's rooms on January 12, a programme of old music which fully maintained the interest of the series was brought forward, and successfully accomplished. The work of chief interest was a 'Sinfonia' in D minor by Friedemann Bach, laid out for two flutes, two violins, viola, violoncello and 'continuo.' As far as the concert gives could ascertain, it was performed on this occasion for the first time in London, as also were a String quartet in A by Michael Haydn; a Concerto in G (Op. 9, No. 1) by Charles Avison, scored for strings and 'continuo'; and a Sonata in E minor for two flutes by J. A. Hasse (Op. 1, No. 1). A Violoncello sonata by Veracini, a Harpsichord sonata by G. F. Doles, and a Quartet by Mozart for flute and strings, completed the programme. Miss Hannah Bryant played the harpsichord music with great skill, Messrs. Albert and Henry Fransella were able flautists, and Messrs. Bonarius, Wynn Reeves, Hobday and Such were the string players.

On January 22, Mr. Joseph Holbrooke inaugurated the ninth year of his series of British chamber concerts. A Pianoforte trio (No. 2, in G minor) by Mr. Jervis Read was introduced to the British public—as represented by an audience that failed to make even the Salle Erard look well filled. Perhaps Mr. Holbrooke's recent remorseless attack on deadheads has pained those useful members of the concert-going public. It is to be hoped that the outcome will be frequent performance in a larger arena, for the work was well received and was thoroughly deserving of its success. It is designed in one movement, and exhibits a command of form, effective scoring and harmonic resource. The other concerted works performed were a Pianoforte quartet (No. 2, in G minor) by Mr. R. H. Walthew, and Mr. Holbrooke's 'third and last' Pianoforte quintet (Op. 45). The executants were Mr. Walthew and Mr. Holbrooke (pianoforte), Mr. John Saunders and Mr. Charles Woodhouse (violin), Mr. Ernest Yonge (viola), Mr. Jean Preuveeners and Mr. Charles Crabbe (violoncello). English songs were given by Miss Effie Martyn. Whether Mr. Holbrooke would class this lady as a vocalist or a singer we are unaware, but to us at least she is both.

The Bechstein Hall was too small to accommodate all who came, on January 20, to hear Madame Kirkby Lunn give her recital, announced as her only one this season. Though seldom heard as a lieder singer, Madame Kirkby Lunn attains as high a standard in this capacity as in her better-known operatic rôles. Her programme was varied, and included a group of modern English songs, of which one of the most successful came from the pen of Mr. Percy Pitt, who was the accompanist.

On January 18 the Central London Choral and Orchestral Society gave a concert in St. James's Hall, under the skilful guidance of Mr. David Thomas. Elgar's choral suite 'From the Bavarian Highlands' and a concert version of German's 'A Princess of Kensington' were the chief works in a well-chosen popular programme. Both chorus and orchestra contributed to the success of the performances. The instrumentalists were heard alone in Godard's 'Kermesse' and Eilenburg's 'Coronation march.' The solo singers were Miss Elsie Short and Mr. Gwilym Richards.

The Railway Clearing-house Musical Society (male-voice and orchestral), which has been recently formed, successfully held its first concert at St. James's Hall on January 4. The male-voice portion of the programme was given with excellent tone and expression. Among the orchestral items was Schubert's 'Unfinished' symphony. The concerted items were acceptably interspersed with solos. Mr. T. Smith was the conductor.

A concert in aid of the St. John's College (Cambridge) Mission to Walworth was given at Kensington Town Hall on January 11. Mr. C. B. Rootham, who is organist of the College, contributed two compositions to the programme. The one was a pleasantly-written String quintet, played under the leadership of Miss Marion Scott; the other, a setting of Scott's 'Coronach' for baritone solo and male chorus, sung by Mr. Robert Chignell and members of the College Choir and Musical Society. The following madrigals and part-songs were performed: 'Lullaby' (Byrd), 'Sir Patrick Spens' (Pearsall), 'Come, pretty wag' (Parry), and 'The Fairies' (Stanford). Miss Hilda Marchand (vocalist), Mr. E. P. Taylor (pianist) and a male-voice quartet also took part.

The vocal class at Walthamstow connected with the Essex County Council, gave a musical evening at the Technical Institute on January 15, under the conductorship of Dr. W. Lemare, when the programme included the following part-music: 'The village choristers' (Moscheles); 'The whispering leaves' (W. Lemare); 'The country dance,' 'The Pedlar,' 'The commotion of love' and 'Come, all ye lads and lasses,' all from H. Lane Wilson's cycle 'Flora's holiday.' These were interspersed with numerous vocal and pianoforte solos.

Music in the Provinces.

BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

For the first time within recollection there was a concert in our Town Hall on the first of January. The concert was given by the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Arthur W. Payne, who has already on former occasions officiated in a similar capacity. The programme was distinctly of a popular character, and comprised the overtures 'William Tell' and '1812,' Moszkowsky's Suite 'From Foreign Parts,' Rachmaninoff's 'Prelude,' excellently orchestrated, Saint-Saëns's 'Rouet d'Omphale,' and Sullivan's 'Graceful Dance and March' from the incidental music to 'Henry VIII.' These excerpts were interpreted in a thoroughly characteristic manner and were admirable in execution. Miss Tilly Richards, the possessor of a pleasing mezzo-soprano voice of sympathetic timbre, made her début here on this occasion, creating a favourable impression. Mr. Jesse Hackett gave a brilliant and telling delivery of 'Sound an alarm.'

The Birmingham Amateur Opera Society, who have rendered such excellent service in the past, were once more associated with the annual conversation of the Midland Institute, and gave in the large Lecture Theatre of that institution, on January 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, capital performances of Gilbert and Sullivan's 'The Yeomen of the Guard,' under Mr. Franklyn Mountford's conductorship. Chorus and orchestra, which are always a feature of these representations, were again excellent. The efficient cast of principals included Mesdames C. O. Whitfield, May Ford and Beatrice Kendall, Messrs. Percy Taunton, Harry Burman, Frank Titterton, H. H. Monckton, and E. Hastings Grainger.

A concert of special interest was given in the Windsor Room of the Grand Hotel, on January 11, by Miss Violet Banks, the object being to introduce some new artists to a local audience, namely, Miss Carmen Hill, and Miss Fanny Everleigh (violinist), Mr. Hubert Bath not only officiating as accompanist and solo pianist, but also figuring as composer. Miss Carmen Hill gave a most impressive and sympathetic rendering of Schubert's 'Du bist die Ruh.' Miss Everleigh, who is a pupil of Emile Sauret, plays like an artist in the true sense of the word. Mr. Hubert Bath, who is already well known here as the accompanist to the Theatre Royal Promenade Concerts, had arduous duties to perform, and was excellent in each capacity.

The third Harrison Concert took place in the Town Hall on January 17, the chief interest being centred in the first rendering in the Midlands of Liza Lehmann's musical brochure, 'Nonsense Songs,' given by Miss Bessie Mark, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Pianoforte and violin solos were respectively rendered by Miss Edie Marr and Miss Margery Bentwich.

A correction.—With reference to some comments made in our issue of November, 1909 (p. 736, col. 1), as to the organ in the Birmingham Town Hall being tuned to the high pitch, Mr. C. W. Perkins informs us that the pitch of the organ has been for some years and still is A 439.

BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Ladies' Night of the Bristol Madrigal Society was held on January 13 at the Victoria Rooms. A few additional members have joined the choir during the year, the singers now numbering 116, most of whom were present. An excellent programme was performed, including some of the fine madrigals of the Elizabethan period, compositions by Pearsall (one of the earliest members of the Society) and part-songs by Mendelssohn. There was one piece which had not previously been given by the choir, viz., 'Tuneful bells,' by Dr. Charles Wood, and it was well received. The contributions which were repeated in compliance with the desire of the audience were 'Matona, lovely maiden' (O. Lassus), 'Weary wind of the west' (Elgar), 'Sir Patrick Spens' (Pearsall), and 'Lullaby of life' (Leslie). Under the capable direction of Mr. D. W. Rootham fine interpretations were given of the different specimens of part-music, the light and shade being most effective. There was a large attendance, among those present being Mr. Oscar Street, hon. secretary of the Madrigal Society, London.

DEVON.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

In spite of the formal disbandment of the Plymouth Guildhall Choir, Mr. H. Moreton, conductor, was able to reassemble with very few exceptions all the former members for a performance, on December 29, of the 'Messiah,' in aid of funds for the unemployed. The singing of the chorus was so fine as to draw forth many expressions of regret, public and personal, that so great an acquisition to the town should be allowed to pass away. The band, led by Mr. John Pardew, and the soloists—Miss Emily Breare, Miss Louise Sims, Messrs. Albert Collings and Joseph Farrington—all gave their services, and over £80 was realised.

It is encouraging to note that a new choral society has been formed at Brixham, a North Devon fishing village, with the unusual feature of a lady conductor, Mrs. Clarke having been elected to the post.

At their second concert this season, at Torquay, on January 20, the Haydn String Quartet (Mr. H. Croker, leader) played Beethoven's Op. 59, No. 1, and Mendelssohn's Op. 44, No. 1. Miss Louise Sims was the vocalist.

EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the sixth of Messrs. Paterson's Orchestral concerts, given in the McEwan Hall on December 20, Dr. Richter conducted splendid performances of Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, the Prelude to Wagner's 'Lohengrin,' Cherubini's 'Anacréon' Overture and pieces by Bach, Cornelius and Dvorák.

At the seventh concert, on December 27, Dr. Cowen conducting, the programme included the Prelude to 'Parsifal' and works by Mozart, Bach, and Debussy. M. Jean Gerardy gave a masterly rendering of Saint-Saëns's Violoncello concerto in A minor, and later, accompanied by Mr. Scott Jupp, he delighted the audience by his playing of Schumann's 'Abendlied' and Popper's 'Hungarian Rhapsody.' The eighth concert, on January 10, was conducted by Mr. Henri Verbruggen. The chief orchestral item on the programme was Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D, which was beautifully played. The vocalist was Mlle. Antonia Dolores, who was very successful in her singing of compositions by Rossini, Massenet, Purcell and others.

Dr. Cowen conducted the ninth concert, on January 17, at which Beethoven's somewhat rarely heard Symphony in F (No. 8) was performed. M. Raoul Pugno played superbly the solo part of Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto in C minor, and later, some Chopin pieces to which he had to concede a double encore.

A remarkably fine performance of 'The Messiah' was given in the McEwan Hall, on December 25, by Mr. Moonie's choir, who sang, as usual, with great verve and brilliancy.

The Choral Union gave their annual performance of 'The Messiah' in the Music Hall on New Year's Day, and the large body of singers, under the able direction of Mr. T. H. Collinson, sang with all their accustomed fine quality and solidity of tone.

During the Christmas season performances of 'The Messiah' were also given by the Leith Choral Society, and by many of the church choirs in the city.

Mr. W. B. Moonie, a young local musician (Bucher Scholar of Edinburgh University, 1905-1908) gave a well-attended concert in the Freemasons' Hall on January 18. The programme was devoted to compositions from his own pen, and comprised pieces for string orchestra, solos for pianoforte and for violoncello, and songs. In each item the qualities of refinement and melodiousness were noticeable features, and with greater experience in his art Mr. Moonie ought to go far. The amount of promise and real talent displayed in the works performed won for him a most encouraging reception, and his future career will be watched with interest. Mr. Moonie was assisted by Miss Chrissie Macdiarmid, Mr. George Campbell (vocalists), Miss Berta Tait (solo pianist), Mr. David Millar-Craig (solo violoncellist), and an orchestra led by Mr. Colin Mackenzie. The composer, besides acting as conductor and accompanist, played two pianoforte solos, a 'Highland Melody' and a 'Réverie,' the latter of which he had to repeat.

Artistically accompanied by Miss Marguerite Bruel at the pianoforte, Miss Agnes Copeland gave a violin recital in the Freemasons' Hall on January 19. The programme was of a varied and high-class nature. Some of the pieces chosen contained great technical difficulties, but throughout the recital Miss Copeland showed herself more than equal to her task. Conspicuously successful in all her efforts, perhaps the greatest result was achieved in an exceptionally fine performance of Bach's 'Chaconne.'

GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the sixth Classical Concert on December 21, Dr. Hans Richter conducted the Scottish Orchestra in a noble performance of the 'Eroica' Symphony, and at the seventh concert on December 28, M. Jean Gerardy was soloist, taking part in Saint-Saëns's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra. The New Year's music began with the time-honoured performance of 'The Messiah' by the Choral Union on January 1, when Dr. Coward secured, as usual, a strikingly fine rendering. Performances of 'The Messiah' were also given by the Choral Union on January 13, and the Young Men's Christian Association Choral Institute on January 4; also by the Kilmarnock Choral Union and by the Coatbridge Choral Union.

The Pollokshields Philharmonic Society, which is doing much for the cause of high-class choral music in the city, gave a very successful performance of Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'The Death of Minnehaha' on January 6. Mr. John Cullen, the able conductor of the Society, had evidently bestowed great pains in the preparation of the choruses, and the tone, attack, phrasing, and expression were worthy of high praise. The accompaniments were finely played by the Scottish Orchestra, and a highly-capable quintet of solo vocalists—Misses Edith Evans and Doris Woodall, and Messrs. John Harrison, Charles Victor, and Hugh Mitchell—performed their part with much acceptance.

At the ninth Classical Concert on January 4, Dr. Cowen conducted the Scottish Orchestra, and Mr. Henri Verbruggen, as solo violinist, gave a powerful rendering of Beethoven's Violin concerto. The programme also included two novelties—Tchaikovsky's symphonic fantasia

'The Tempest' and Strauss's 'Fest Marsch.' Madame Kirkby Lunn was solo vocalist. Mr. Henri Verbruggen officiated as conductor at the tenth Classical Concert on January 11, and we have to record one of the finest performances given by the Scottish Orchestra this season. This was notably the case in the overture to 'Der Freischütz' and in Brahms's second Symphony in D, and scarcely less so in numbers by Sibelius, Debussy and Berlioz. By this performance Mr. Verbruggen, who had memorized his programme, has greatly enhanced his reputation as an orchestral conductor of distinction. Miss Antonia Dolores, as soloist, sang numbers by Mozart and Purcell with much charm.

At his third Chamber Concert on January 17, Mr. A. M. Henderson was associated with Miss Bessie Spence in a very musicianly interpretation of pianoforte and violin Sonatas by Mozart (No. 6, in G major) and Grieg (C minor, Op. 45). The programme was varied by Miss Jean Watson's artistic rendering of songs by Schumann, Debussy, Strauss, and Cornelius.

The outstanding feature of the eleventh Classical Concert, on January 18, was M. Raoul Pugno's finished performance of Saint-Saëns's fourth Pianoforte concerto in C minor, in which the distinguished pianist was ably supported by the Scottish Orchestra. The purely orchestral numbers on the programme were Brahms's 'Tragic' overture, Beethoven's eighth Symphony, and a first performance here of Paul Dukas's Scherzo for orchestra, 'L'Apprenti Sorcier.'

During the month quite attractive programmes have been given at the Saturday Popular concerts, among the novelties presented being a selection from Lalo's 'Narmouna,' and Walford Davies's 'Melody' for strings and organ. Among the solo vocalists have been Miss Antonia Dolores and Messrs. William Green and Frederic Austin. Mr. Frederic Siegl, the deputy leader of the Scottish Orchestra, made a highly successful appearance as solo violinist in Vieuxtemps' Ballade and Polonaise for violin and orchestra.

LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The first two parts of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio,' given here for the first time, with Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang,' formed the programme of the Philharmonic Society's concert on December 21. Mendelssohn's beautiful music, with its glowing orchestration, was heard in effective contrast with the austere grandeur of Bach, and the performance of both works under Dr. Cowen's direction was adequate in all respects. The solos were excellently sustained by Miss Perceval Allen, Madame Edna Thornton, Mr. John Harrison, and Mr. Hamilton Earle. In the duet 'I waited for the Lord,' a young local soprano, Miss Edina Thraves, had an opportunity of which she fully availed herself.

An item of unusual interest in the programme of the New Year's concert of the Philharmonic Society, on January 11, was César Franck's symphonic poem 'Les Djinns,' for orchestra and pianoforte. This work of the gifted Belgian, whose writings may be regarded as the centre and fountain of the revival of French music, made a highly favourable impression here, when heard for the first time. The music is weirdly descriptive of the lines of Victor Hugo which serve as its programme. It is full of imagination and colour. In the clever hands of M. Raoul Pugno it goes without saying that the obligato pianoforte part was played with remarkable skill. The eminent French pianist was also heard delightfully in Mozart's Pianoforte concerto in E flat major (K. 271), one feature of which is the interpolated Minuet which strangely occurs in the Finale. Other features of this successful concert included Tchaikovsky's Fantasia 'The Tempest' (Op. 18), and Cowen's cleverly-written Overture 'The Butterfly's Ball.' The chorus sang Berlioz's 'Farewell of the Shepherds,' and Madame Kirkby Lunn was the vocalist.

A gratifying result of the encouragement given to local composers by the Liverpool Church Choir Association, who at their recent festival performed a work recommended by Sir Charles Stanford, viz., Mr. Edward Watson's anthem, 'Sing we merrily,' is the forthcoming performance of that work by the Philharmonic Society on February 22, for which occasion the composer has written orchestral parts. The compliment thus paid by the premier Society is all the more noteworthy by reason of a departure from the conservative policy which usually obtains with regard to new works. In the present instance the Society's prompt recognition of local merit is as deserved as it is stimulating to others.

Two compositions aroused special interest in the programme of the Symphony Orchestra's Concert on January 18. These were Mr. Granville Bantock's Comedy Overture 'The Pierrot of the Minute,' a cleverly descriptive piece in lighter vein, and Rachmaninoff's second Pianoforte concerto in C minor, Op. 18, in which the solo part was played by Miss Myrta Stubbs. In this Concerto, which is hardly to be accounted a great work, she showed fine spirit and dexterity as well as musical feeling. Miss Emily Breare sang with great charm in Liszt's melodious descriptive song 'The Loreley.' Mr. Akeroyd conducted interesting performances of Berlioz's 'Carnaval Romain' overture and Dvorák's 'From the New World.'

At the third Schiever Quartet concert, on January 22, a further instalment of four Beethoven quartets was played, including the C minor (Op. 18), G major (Op. 18), F minor (Op. 95), and F major (Op. 135).

A new and important musical organization has arisen in the Oxtou and Cloughton Orchestral Society. Conducted by Mr. J. E. Matthews, the first concert was given on January 22, when the orchestra played Schubert's B minor Symphony, overture 'Iphigenia en Aulis' (Gluck) and Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto No. 3 (C minor), in which Dr. Stanley Dale sustained the solo part. The vocalist was Mr. A. Sergiades.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Not even the stress and tumult of a fierce political campaign has been able to silence the voice of music in our midst. The Free Trade Hall, and other public rooms, have resounded to the solemn strains of Ebenezer Elliott's 'When wilt Thou save the people,' our pulses were quickened by the stirring 'Land Song,' or the hymns of faith and freedom chanted to such inspiring tunes as 'The March of the Men of Harlech' by male-voice choirs several thousands strong. Even in election week the attendance at Hallé's showed little falling off. After the recess, Dr. Richter and his forces played a programme on January 6 which included three novelties for Manchester concert-goers, and most important of these was Bach's sixth Concerto, commissioned by the Margrave of Brandenburg for his private band, arranged for viole, violoncelli, and contrabassi: each divisi. The hearer experienced many fresh thrills—the sense of the multitudinous in sound—and the rich, warm string tone (without the violins) gave the impression of a huge body of tenor and bass voices. Richter, conducting Bach, Beethoven or Wagner, is like the old war-steed hearing the bugle call, and the reception afforded this old-world novelty must have gladdened the conductor's heart. Mr. Ernest Schelling, pupil of Paderewski, who has played under Dr. Richter in London, brought a 'Fantastic Suite,' already given by him with Mengelberg at Amsterdam, and by the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras. The orchestral instrumentalists are treated as so many virtuosi players in this composition for pianoforte and orchestra. Its diabolical cleverness and sparkling effervescence introduced a new note of colour into our musical experiences here; both conductor and composer-pianist had worked hard at its preparation, and the audience was genuinely enthusiastic. An ultra-modern of Mr. Schelling's type can have little in common with Schumann's Pianoforte concerto, given at this concert, and it is significant of the tastes of the pianoforte players visiting Manchester, that this concerto had not figured in a Hallé programme for quite ten years, and then was played by Rosenthal. Tchaikovsky's 'Tempest' poem had never been done in Manchester prior to January 6, but, apart from the wonderful suggestion of the 'light and sound and darkness of the sea' in the opening and closing sections, it did not succeed in conveying any powerful impressions.

An unusual departure from the practice observed at the Hallé Concerts, at any rate since the founder's death, was the performance by Mr. John Coates, on January 13, of two groups of modern lieder, both German and British, revealing the singer in quite a new light to Manchester audiences, and incidentally leading to the inclusion of more examples of modern creative art in one programme than at any concert for some years past. Mr. Coates sang everything with consummate art, and the experiment was generally voted most successful. Mr. R. J. Forbes once again proved worthy of the responsibilities entrusted to his care in the accompaniments.

The performance of 'Elijah' at the succeeding concert merely calls for mention. Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Dalton Baker were a new quartet of soloists in this work, if not to Manchester, certainly to these concerts.

For some time past there have been expressions of opinion, both in the Press and in private circles, that if the choral concerts of the Hallé series could have some of that exceedingly careful preparation which characterizes the work of the bodies singing choral miniatures, we should get worthier performances of the master-works of choral literature than have been experienced of late years. A section of the Hallé Choir sang at a recent Gentlemen's Concert, under Mr. Henry J. Wood, Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' and Haydn's 'Spring.' No doubt there were some who wished that Mr. Wood's energies might have been utilised to better purpose in giving at this concert of Manchester's oldest musical institution some of the numerous chamber-choral works with which this centre is unacquainted, and to progressives the regret is quite natural. Still, it was known that Mr. Wood had expended exceptional pains upon the preparation of these works, taking personally three choir rehearsals, in addition to those with the chorus-master, Mr. R. H. Wilson, with results that in one way amply justified those who have contended that, if the works on the lowlier plane of choral miniatures are worth the keen preparation undoubtedly bestowed upon them, then works of greater dimensions ought to receive at least the same care. Our smaller choirs are continually raising the standard, and the larger ones cannot afford to lag behind.

The first Saturday Promenade Concert of the year brought Mr. R. J. Forbes into prominence in Saint-Saëns's 'Africa' poem for pianoforte and orchestra, that brilliant and resourceful work so essentially French in its origin. Elgar's second 'Wand of youth' suite was so successful that the last movement was repeated. The eighth concert was devoted to Tchaikovsky's works, the vocalists this month having been Madame Sadler-Fogg and Mr. Charles Tree.

Mr. Carl Fuchs, who controls the musical destinies of the Schiller-Anstalt, introduced a young English pianist, Mr. Roger Thynne, a student from Munich, who played Beethoven's A flat Sonata and, with Mr. Fuchs, Grieg's Violoncello sonata. Mr. Thynne's fluent style was well suited to Debussy's first 'Arabesque' and Liszt's D flat Study. Miss Lillie Wormald, one of the first-fruits of the Royal Manchester College of Music, now a member of the staff where once a student, sang ten songs in French, German, Italian, Scandinavian and English. Her distinguishing characteristic is art, rather than heart, and in her own class of song she takes high rank.

It will be remembered that Granville Bantock's Suite, first performed at the last Hereford festival, was based on the old English incidental music which he had composed last winter for the Manchester Gaiety Theatre's production of 'The knight of the burning pestle.' For the current revival of 'Much ado about nothing,' Professor Bantock has written an overture based on John Bull's 'The king's hunt,' and the Pavane, Galiardo and Lavolta, so beautifully danced by Madge Atkinson, Hilda Davies and Mercy Manners, have been arranged from the works of William Byrd. The music for the entr'actes and between the scenes has been selected and arranged by Dr. Henry Watson, and is entirely of the old English madrigalian school.

The Blackburn St. Cecilia Choral Society and the Preston Choral Society have been under the guidance of Dr. E. C. Bairstow for two seasons, and their close contiguity makes possible a form of co-operation worthy of emulation in other centres of similar convenience of situation. Last season the two Societies jointly engaged the Hallé band and distinguished soloists for two successive evenings, for the performance of Elgar's 'The Kingdom,' the Preston choir helping Blackburn and vice versa. Societies of limited means can only tackle the production of modern choral works on these lines: alone it were impossible, but hand in hand the difficulties vanish. This season Berlioz's 'Faust,' never heard in Lancashire outside Manchester or Liverpool, will be performed in this co-operative manner.

The Accrington Chamber Concerts which, in the seventeenth season, will reach the fiftieth concert, are a fair example of the work which is going on quite unostentatiously in many parts of the industrial North Country, in centres which are not usually linked in the average musician's mind with high-class music. Accringtonians have in the past generously assisted and encouraged deserving native ability by helping young students to college, and the first concert of the current season was given by seven students, past or present, of the Royal Manchester College of Music. On January 28, Mr. Naum Blinder, Mr. J. H. Foulds, Mr. Alwyne Browne, and the sisters Edith and Helena McCullagh, were the performers.

The Oldham Amateur Orchestral Society has recently celebrated its jubilee. Like many other Societies of this sort in Lancashire, it started in quite humble fashion, only eleven persons being present at its first rehearsal, four of that number, happily, being still active members. Until quite recently the conductorship had been in the family of Lawton, father and son discharging these important duties, the son passing from accompanist to the conductor's desk. In 1905 Mr. Frederic Dawson came to assist Mr. William Lawton by conducting a pianoforte concerto, and since that time his interest in the Society has developed to such an extent that now his time and talents are devoted weekly to this fine work. Oldham, like other Lancashire towns, has had a succession of able, public-spirited men (and women), who have done fine service in the cause of music. The first President was Mr. Peter Brooks. Later, Mr. Charles E. Lees and Mr. Sam R. Platt, both heads of great machinery firms in the town, filled this important office. After Mr. Sam Platt's death, Mrs. Charles E. Lees accepted office as President, and still exercises the same beneficent influence as did her late husband, furthering the Society's best interests in every imaginable way. Mrs. Charles Lee's munificence is not limited to Oldham; the authorities of the Royal Manchester College of Music also enjoy her sympathetic assistance. About fifty friends and subscribers of this Orchestral Society have helped in the laudable effort of forming a library of orchestral music. That the committee are not unmindful of the efforts of the great ones of the past for the social and moral uplifting of the people, is shown on the programme of this jubilee celebration concert, which bears the arms of Hugh Oldham, Bishop of Exeter, of pious memory in South-East Lancashire, for he founded that great public school, the Manchester Grammar School.

NEWCASTLE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A programme of British music (ancient and modern) was presented at the third concert of the Classical Concert Society on January 6. A sonata by Daniel Purcell and a manuscript 'Chacony' by Henry Purcell, a delightful, short string quartet by Charles Wesley and a Concerto for strings and pianoforte by an old Newcastle worthy, Charles Avison, were selected to represent old music. A long and somewhat dry trio for English horn, violin and pianoforte, by D. F. Tovey, a Phantasie for string quartet, by Frank Bridge, and a charming Pianoforte trio by the late W. Y. Hurlstone, formed the modern section. The artists were Mr. H. Bonarius, Mr. H. W. Reeves (violin), Mr. A. Hobday (viola), Mr. C. Such (violinello), Mr. E. Dubrucq (English horn), and Mr. N. Swanson (pianoforte).

The Glee and Madrigal Society gave a number of familiar glees, under the conductorship of Mr. J. R. Liddell, on January 18. The same evening Mozart's Clarinet quintet and Schubert's Octet received musically interpretations from members of the Queen's Hall Orchestra at a concert of the Chamber Music Society. Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Wood were also originally engaged to appear.

This is always a barren time for music here, but this year it has been even more so than usual, for, since the customary outbreak of 'Messiahs' just before Christmas, and of pantomime after it, people have been far too busy electioneering to take much interest in music—though the art which 'soothes the savage breast' ought certainly to be of exceptional value at a political crisis. In the last week of the old year the Carl Rosa Company visited Halifax, and gave a programme which deserves record for its enterprise. During the week they produced eight different operas: not only such hackneyed ones as 'Faust,' 'Carmen,' 'Trovatore,' and 'Tannhäuser,' but Nicolai's 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' 'Figaro,' Verdi's 'Forza del Destino,' and 'Tristan'—the last with Madame Gleeson-White in the title-rôle. Such a record ought not to be so remarkable as it is for a town of over a hundred thousand inhabitants, but in the present haphazard condition of operatic affairs in this country it is worth recording.

On New Year's Day the Leeds Municipal Concert was given up almost entirely to Wagner, the programme including the 'Siegfried' Idyll, the 'Rienzi,' 'Faust' and 'Meistersinger' overtures, and the 'Huldigungsmarsch,' together with Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony—music in which the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fricker's direction, can give a good account of itself. The programme of the Hull Symphony Orchestra on January 5 included a Haydn Symphony and Cowen's piquant 'Language of flowers' suite, as well as some other examples of light orchestral music. Mr. Arthur Wallerstein conducted on this occasion, as at the concert on January 19, when Beethoven's second Symphony, the 'Finlandia' of Sibelius, and a Suite from Rubinstein's 'Feramors' formed the programme.

At the Bradford Subscription Concert on January 14, Miss Marie Hall was among the artists who took part in a programme which, if 'miscellaneous,' was not in any respect inartistic. The pianist was the youthful Lengyel von Bagota, whose advance in his art, symbolised by his promotion to trousers, was shown in a really artistic performance of pieces as exacting as Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, and Chopin's F minor Fantasia. M. Gerardy's perfect art was displayed in Boellmann's Symphonic Variations for the violoncello, and the vocalist was Miss Agnes Christa. At the Leeds Musical Evening on January 11, Mr. Edgar Haddock, one of the concert-givers, was the violinist, and, with Mr. Sigmund Oppenheim as pianist, set a good example by giving a Beethoven violin sonata other than the 'Kreutzer'—the beautiful work in G (Op. 30). On January 19 one of the excellent chamber concerts of the Rasch String Quartet took place at Leeds, Beethoven's late Quartet in B flat (Op. 130), the unfinished quartet of Grieg, and that curious conceit, the set of variations on a Volkslied by ten different Russian composers, forming the programme.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

At the French Theatre the first performance of Henri Favier's opera founded on Maeterlinck's 'Monna Vanna' took place with great success before a crowded audience. At the same place Charpentier's 'Louise' was also recently revived. The Flemish Theatre produced a new opera, 'Rosemarijnje,' by A. van Oosten, to the libretto of R. Verhulst.

BARCELONA.

Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' opened the season at the Liceo Theatre with great success. The work was conducted by Herr Franz Beidler, and the title-parts were in the hands of Señor Vinas and Señora Gagliardi.

BARMEN.

The Allgemeiner Konzertverein gave Handel's seldom-heard 'Belshazzar' in a new and effective version by Musikdirektor C. Hopfe. The work, which was excellently performed, created a deep impression. Of the soloists

Mr. John Coates in the part of Belshazzar particularly distinguished himself, and the Allgemeine Musikzeitung says that the artistic feeling and technical perfection he displayed, created the wish that so excellent an artist might be heard more frequently in Germany.

BERLIN.

The Königliche Kapelle, conducted by Dr. Richard Strauss, produced a new Symphony by Count Bolko von Hochberg, and at the fifth Philharmonic Concert Professor Nikisch introduced new orchestral Variations by Wilhelm Berger. —At his orchestral concert Professor Xaver Scharwenka conducted excerpts from his opera 'Mataswinta,' and also produced a new Pianoforte concerto of his own composition. —The Singakademie (conductor, Professor Georg Schumann) gave a few days before Christmas its usual excellent performance of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio.' —Verdi's 'Requiem,' under Oscar Fried's inspired baton, made a deep impression upon the audience of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. —At the concert of the Professor Anna Schulz-Asten Ladies' Choir, well-nigh ideal performances were given of some of Brahms's most beautiful part-songs, among them the Songs with two horns and harp (Op. 27), the wonderful canon 'Einförmig ist der Liebe Gram,' the 'Ave Maria,' and the 13th Psalm. —An unusually interesting programme was submitted by the Kammermusikverein der Kgl. Kapelle. The scheme included, besides Mozart's Divertimento in B flat for two violins, viola, bass and two horns (Köchel No. 287), the new Quintet for pianoforte, violin, violoncello, clarinet and horn by Robert Kahn, Saint-Saëns's Septet with trumpet, and the highly interesting Sérénade Mauresque for twelve instruments (double quintet of wind and string instruments and two horns) by Elgar. Die Musik expresses the opinion that this piquant piece cannot be too highly recommended for such popular concerts. —At other concerts several new chamber music compositions were heard, such as Karg-Elert's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, and a new Violin sonata (Op. 33) by Noren. Some interesting modern and antique French pianoforte music (from François Couperin to Debussy) was played by Mlle. Marie Dubois, and of other pianoforte novelties lately heard, Dohnányi's 'Humoresken in Form einer Suite' (Op. 17), a Suite by Paul Ertel, Hugo Kaun's 'Passacaglia' for two pianofortes and a Prelude by Blanchet, deserve special mention.

BREMEN.

Three novelties (in Bremen), viz., Brahms's beautiful Orchestral Serenade (Op. 11), Hugo Wolf's 'Italian' Serenade, and the seventh Symphony by Bruckner, were recently introduced by Herr Ernst Wendel, the new conductor at the Philharmonic concerts.

BÜCKEBURG.

At the fourth Symphony Concert (conducted by Professor Sahla), Granville Bantock's overture 'The Pierrot of the Minute' made a very favourable impression. At the Chamber Music Concerts, Sibelius's String quartet in D minor (Op. 56) (Voces intimæ) was heard with great interest.

BUDA-PESTH.

Two interesting novelties, viz., Elgar's Symphony, and a suite, 'Pelleas et Mélisande,' by Debussy, figured on the programme of the first Philharmonic concert.

CHARLOTTENBURG.

The programmes of the Historical Concerts given by the Charlottenburger Musikfreunde (conductor, Gustav Lenzewski) contained among others the following interesting old works: 'Brochette musicale,' by Johann Hermann Schein, Sonata à 4, by J. J. Fasch, Trio in B flat, for flute, violin and violoncello (with figured bass), by J. Mysliwecek, Toccata for organ, by G. Muffat, Fantasia No. 6, by Orlando Gibbons, and songs by Dufay, A. de la Hale and Carissimi.

COLOGNE.

The Municipal Theatre recently produced a one-act opera 'Der alte Aar,' by Raoul Günzbourg. On January 4 the first performance in Germany of Gabriel Pierné's 'Die Kinder zu Bethléhem' (Les enfants à Bethléem) took place at the sixth Gurzenich concert in the presence of the composer. The work, which is laid out for soli, chorus, children's chorus (250 school girls and 80 boys from the Domchor took part in the performance), and orchestra, proved very interesting, and obtained an excellent reception.

COPENHAGEN.

On January 15, Wagner's 'Meistersinger' was again revived at the Theatre Royal, and received an excellent rendering under the musical direction of Herr Frederik Rung, with Messrs. Cornelius and Nissen as Walther von Stolzing and Hans Sachs respectively.

DRESDEN.

Two one-act operas, viz., Leo Blech's 'Versiegelt' and 'Der Wanderer' (Il Viandante), by Enrico Bossi, were given for the first time at the Royal Opera House. The work of Bossi contains many noble thoughts, but is handicapped by its undramatic libretto. —The second Hoftheaterconcert was devoted to works of Brahms (whose compositions during the master's lifetime were much neglected in Dresden). The programme included the 'Tragic' overture, the second Symphony in D major, and the Pianoforte concerto in B flat, performed for the first time at these concerts. It was excellently played by Herr Arthur Schnabe. A new Symphony in F minor by Hermann Zilcher had a good reception at the third concert, the programme of which also contained César Franck's D minor Symphony.

ELBERFELD.

On December 11 the Elberfelder Konzertgesellschaft gave the first complete performance in Germany of 'Eine Messe des Lebens,' by the English composer, Frederick Delius. According to the Allgemeine Musikzeitung, the work is full of new and exquisite beauty. The performance, under the conductorship of Dr. Haym, did full justice to this extraordinary composition.

FRANKFORT.

Eugen d'Albert's new opera 'Izevl' had a very good reception on its première at the Opera House. —The Cäcilienverein, conducted by Herr Willem Mengelberg, gave a most excellent performance of Handel's oratorio 'Judas Maccabæus.'

GRONINGEN.

On December 21, the Choral Society 'Bekker' gave very good performances of Brahms's 'German Requiem' and the 'Stabat Mater' of Dvorák.

HAMBURG.

Berlioz's gigantic 'Totenmesse' was performed at the fifth Philharmonic concert, the choral part being rendered by the Singakademie (conductor, Professor Barth). The famous 'Tuba mirum' (with four additional brass instrument orchestras, one placed in each corner of the hall) proved very impressive.

KIEL.

The Municipal Theatre has presented two new one-act operas, 'Versiegelt' by Leo Blech, and 'Das süsse Gift' by Albert Gortler. —The Kieler Gesangverein gave an excellent programme, including Mozart's 'Maurischer Trauermusik,' Brahms's 'Nänie,' and Prelude and Grail scene from Wagner's 'Parsifal.'

KÖNIGSBERG.

On the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the opening of the Municipal Theatre, the old opera 'Fanchon das Leyermädchen,' by H. Fr. Himmel (which was very popular a hundred years ago), was revived. Another more modern work, Puccini's 'Madama Butterfly,' has lately been performed for the first time.

LEIPSIK.

The pièce de résistance of the ninth Gewandhausconcert was Volkmann's rarely heard D minor Symphony. The 25th anniversary of the inauguration of the Neues Gewandhaus (the building where the concerts now take place) occurred on December 11. The event was celebrated at the tenth concert with Beethoven's overture 'Die Weihe des Hauses' and the C minor Symphony. In addition thereto Professor Straube played Mendelssohn's Organ sonata in A major, and the TL-manerchor sang the Christmas music from the same master's "Christens," as well as three part-songs by Carl Reinecke. The latter veteran artist, who was for so many years conductor of the Gewandhaus, was present at the concert, and both he and the present conductor, Professor Nikisch, were the object of enthusiastic ovations.—At one of the last Philharmonic concerts the first performance of the Symphonic poem "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, took place under the conductorship of Herr Hans Winderstein.—At the chamber music concert in the Gewandhaus many interesting works have lately been brought forward, as, for instance, the rarely performed Serenade (Op. 25) by Beethoven, César Franck's Pianoforte quintet, and the Septet, with trumpet, by Saint-Saëns.

LAUSANNE.

Liszt's symphonic poem 'Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne,' César Franck's 'Le Chasseur maudit,' and 'Improvisations for orchestra,' by Emmanuel Mör, have been among the most interesting works recently played at the Symphony Concerts.

LIÈGE.

At the Théâtre Royal, Wagner's 'Meistersinger' was performed for the first time.

LILLE.

Madame Maurice Maquet (who has taken her late husband's place as conductor) gave an excellent Christmas concert, the programme of which contained Bach's Magnificat, Concerto for organ and orchestra by Handel, the Entr'acte symphonique from César Franck's 'Rédemption,' and the supremely beautiful 'Requiem' by Mozart.

LIVORNO.

A new opera, 'Zulma,' by Romano Romani, was produced under the composer's musical direction with great success. The libretto, by Alfredo Lenzi, is adapted from a novel by Maxim Gorky.

MILAN.

The Scala opened its season with a fine performance of Wagner's 'Die Walküre.' At the same institution Cherubini's 'Medea' was recently given for the first time in Italy.—The Consolo Quartet have given two concerts exclusively devoted to chamber-music by Brahms, whose compositions are at present very little known in Italy.

MONTE CARLO.

An interesting series of operatic performances is in progress here, including two complete cycles of Wagner's 'Nibelung's Ring.' The series will include, among other operas, Massenet's 'Don Quichotte,' Saint-Saëns's 'Proserpine' and 'Thérèse,' Giordano's 'Fedora,' and Dargomijski's 'La Roussalka.'

MOSCOW.

M. Simin's opera company in the Ssolodownikoff Theatre has given the first Russian performance of Massenet's 'Sappho.'—At the Imperial Opera a special performance was given of Wagner's 'Lohengrin,' with Arthur Nikisch as conductor.—The great baritone, Feodore Schaliapin, appeared with tremendous success in Moussorgsky's 'Boris Godounoff.'—On December 4, the fiftieth anniversary of César Cui's artistic début was celebrated in the great hall of the Imperial Conservatoire by a concert devoted to works of this composer. It was conducted by Ippolitow Iwanoff.

MUNICH.

At the fifth concert of the Konzertverein, Elgar's Symphony was introduced with great success. The Münchener Post expresses the following opinion: 'The name Edward Elgar is important enough to make one go into details with regard to his Symphony. The work constitutes an enormous step forward in comparison with some of his former compositions ("King Olaf," "Froissart," "Cockaigne" overture, and the orchestral Variations). In spite of all the originality displayed in this grand symphony, the themes are sanely invented and are treated with power and due sense of proportion. While the orchestral treatment is of the greatest brilliancy, the effects produced, even at the greatest climaxes, remain ever noble and distinguished.'

This may especially be observed in the Finale, which, in its hymn-like ending, presents an orchestral masterpiece.' At the same concert M. Pugno excelled with his masterly rendering of the solo part of Mozart's Pianoforte concerto No. 9, in E flat (Köch. verz 271).—At the Volks-symphoniekonzerte two Beethoven rarities, the Rondino for eight wind instruments and the first movement from an unpublished Violin concerto in C major (manuscript in possession of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, in Vienna), were heard with interest.

NAPLES.

The San Carlo Theatre inaugurated its season with Wagner's 'Meistersinger,' the work achieving a great success under the musical guidance of Signor Campanini.

PARIS.

The Paris 'British Concerts Society' gave their first concert on January 15 at the Salle Erard. The programme was chosen from the works of sixteen English composers: Messrs. Hubert Bath, Arnold Bax, York Bowen, Paul Corder, Benjamin Dale, Balfour Gardiner, Joseph Holbrooke, Norman O'Neill, Roger Quilter, Jervis Read, Landon Ronald, Cyril Scott, Dr. Arthur Somervell, Dr. Vaughan Williams, Sir Edward Elgar, and Purcell. Two other concerts are to be given.

TURIN.

A new opera, 'Capitan Fracassa,' composed by Mario Costa to a libretto (adapted from a novel of Théophile Gautier) by Guglielmo Emanuel, was produced at the Alfieri Theatre.

WEIMAR.

On December 25, Peter Cornelius's posthumous opera 'Gunlod' was produced in W. v. Bausseum's version at the Court Theatre. Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' was performed for the two-hundredth time on January 11.

WIESBADEN.

Handel's oratorio 'Samson' was excellently rendered by the Cäcilienverein (conductor, Professor Kogel). At the fifth Zykluskonzert, Herr Afferni successfully introduced Fritz Vollbach's Symphony in B minor, Op. 33. Russian names occupied the programme of the sixth concert, which was conducted by M. Safonoff. Of the works performed, Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Oster' overture was new to a German audience.

ZÜRICH.

The Gemischter Chor, conducted by Herr Andrae, gave an impressive performance of the first part of Elgar's 'Traum des Gerontius' (The dream of Gerontius). The many lyrical beauties of the inspired work were much appreciated.

Baron Frédéric d'Erlanger, Mr. William Shakespeare, Mr. Paul Stoeving, and Mr. W. W. Cobbett, the adjudicators in the competition organized by Mr. Cobbett, have awarded the prize of £40 for the best Sonata for pianoforte and violin to Mr. John Ireland. Mr. Eric Gritton, the holder of the Mendelssohn scholarship, gained the second prize (£30), Mr. O'Connor Morris the third (£15), and Miss Spain Dunk (Mrs. H. Gibson) the fourth (£5 5s.). Besides the £20 offered by Captain Beaumont, an equal amount was added by an anonymous donor, thus enabling a rearrangement of the prizes to be made. Mr. Gritton—who is only twenty years of age—and Mr. Ireland both studied composition under Sir Charles Stanford at the Royal College of Music.

At the Musical Association on January 18, in the King's Room at Messrs. Broadwood's, the Rev. H. C. de Lafontaine read a paper on 'The King's Musick,' in which he gave an interesting survey of the Lord Chamberlain's records from 1460 to 1700. The following music was performed: Songs, 'Time stands still' (Dowland) and 'Bid me but live' (H. Lawes), Miss Flora Mann; extracts from music to 'Bonduca' (Purcell), the Chaplin String Quartet (the Misses Kate Chaplin, Florence Moss, Lillian Berger and Mabel Chaplin); Sonata for violin (Purcell), Miss Kate Chaplin; Sonata for violoncello (Henry Eccles), Miss Mabel Chaplin—the pianoforte part in the last two items being taken by Miss Nellie Chaplin.

The part of 'Selene,' the fairy queen, in the Gilbert-German opera 'Fallen fairies' is now being played with great success by Miss Amy Evans, a young singer who has made a name on the concert and Eisteddfod platforms in Wales, but who is new to the stage. She sings a new song, the words of which are by Sir William Gilbert and the music by Edward German. This song has been the subject, first of an injunction, and then of a mysterious law suit brought by Sir William against the Savoy management. It is now restored to the performance by mutual consent.

On Saturday, February 19, Mr. E. van der Straeten will give an illustrated lecture on the 'Viols' at the Bishopsgate Institute. Six old English songs by Coprario, Corkine and Maynard (all about 1610), with accompaniment of two bass viols and pianoforte (instead of harpsichord) will be amongst the musical illustrations; and a 'Fancye' for three viols by Gibbons, some very pretty pieces for three gambas by Marais, and a Serenata by Kühnel for two gambas and pianoforte will also be performed.

In our January issue we recorded the death of Mr. James Whewall, the conductor of the North Staffordshire Choir. We regret to learn that this unexpected catastrophe leaves his family unprovided for. A fund is being raised for their benefit. If any of our readers desire to show their sympathy, and their appreciation of the services rendered to musical progress by the late conductor, will they please send subscriptions to Mr. S. A. Wood, Jervis Street, Hanley?

The vacation courses of lectures and demonstrations given at Wimpole Street from January 10 to 15, under the auspices of the Music Teachers' Association, were very satisfactorily attended. Mr. Stewart Macpherson lectured on 'The musical appreciation class and how to deal with it,' and Mr. Field Hyde gave lessons on 'Ear training for vocal and instrumental teachers.'

With reference to the coming performances of Strauss's 'Elektra,' to be given at Covent Garden Theatre, by Mr. Beecham, it may be of interest to many readers to note that Mr. Paul Corder wrote rather fully about this opera in the Musical Times for March, 1909 (p. 175), on the occasion of the production of the opera, on January 25, at Dresden.

At the monthly meeting of the Tonic Sol-fa Association, held at the Y.M.C.A., Aldersgate Street, on January 15, Dr. McNaught lectured on 'Choral technique and interpretation.' Dr. H. A. Harding, honorary secretary of the Royal College of Organists, was in the chair. Illustrations were performed by the London Tonic Sol-fa Choir.

We are glad to be able to state that Mr. Theodore Byard has now recovered from the dangerous illness contracted on his last visit to Berlin, and is sufficiently convalescent to sojourn in Switzerland. He is assured by his medical adviser that he will be able to recommence his professional career in April.

Dr. Alfred H. Tubby, surgeon to Westminster Hospital, alleges that violin-playing tends to produce curvature of the spine, because it abnormally raises the right shoulder and lowers and advances the left shoulder. If this is true all fairly experienced violinists should bear witness.

A lecture on Hugo Wolf and Max Reger was given by Mr. Sam Langford on January 18, at the meeting of the Birch Literary Society (Manchester). Vocal illustrations were given by Miss Annie Worsley and Mr. Frank Barker.

CARDIFF.—The annual concert of the Cardiff Blue Ribbon Choir took place at Cory Hall on December 27, when the first and second parts of Haydn's 'Creation' were performed. The singing of the choir, under the direction of Mr. Jenkyn Morris, was both intelligent and expressive. A capable orchestra, led by Mr. D. O. Evans, assisted, and the solo vocalists were Miss Carrie Lanceley, Mr. Jack Perry and Mr. David Hughes.

CRANLEIGH.—The Choral Society gave its annual concert in the National Schools on January 5, when Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' was the chief feature of interest. In this work the choir, conducted by Mr. C. H. Vince, was heard to advantage, and received able support from the orchestra, led by Mr. Edward O'Brien.

JOHANNESBURG.—The Musical Society gave an interesting concert in the Transvaal University College Hall on December 14. The programme included Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C minor, the overtures 'Domino noir' (Auber) and 'Raymond' (Ambrose Thomas), and a Symphonic suite on Verdi's 'Aida.' These works were capably performed by the Johannesburg Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. F. W. Peters. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Harold Vickers and Mr. Aldrovand Maynard.

LUTTERWORTH.—The Orchestral and Choral Societies gave their first concert this season in the Town Hall on January 11. The work selected was Cowen's 'St. John's Eve.' The soloists were Miss Preston, Miss Stamford, Mr. W. J. Hodge and the Rev. Richard Spurrell. A very creditable performance was given, under the conductorship of the Rev. M. F. Alderson. The performance included Eaton Fanning's ever-popular 'Song of the Vikings,' for chorus and orchestra.

MORRISTON.—A fine performance of Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' was given, on December 27, in connection with the Eisteddfod here, by the choir of the Tabernacle Church, assisted by Prof. Whitaker's orchestra, with Mrs. T. J. Davies at the organ. The solo vocalists were Miss Ida Kahn, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. David Evans. Mr. Penfro Rowlands conducted. The performance was followed by a miscellaneous programme.

READING.—The St. Luke's Musical Society gave a concert in the Town Hall on January 18, when Sir Frederick Bridge's cantata 'Boadicea' and Sullivan's 'On shore and sea' were performed. These works received an adequate interpretation by the choir and orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. A. C. Foster. The solo vocalists were Madame Cissie Smith, Mr. Malcolm Boyle, Mr. W. Wilson, and Mr. Howard Freeborn.

VENTNOR.—The Musical Society gave a performance of Handel's rarely-heard oratorio, 'Joshua,' in the Town Hall, on January 19. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Evan Jones, sang throughout with much intelligence and good expression, reflecting great credit on the training received from their conductor. There was a small orchestra, and the solo vocalists were Miss Elsie Redfern, Miss Eira Gwyn and Mr. Hubert Baker. Able assistance was rendered by Miss Elsie Trueman and Mr. Alfred Medley at the pianoforte and organ.

Answers to Correspondents.

ORGANIST.—Portraits of organists seated at their respective organs have appeared in the Musical Times as follows: Sir George Martin (March, 1907), John Robinson (Westminster Abbey, 1727-1762) (April, 1907), Sir Frederick Bridge (June, 1907), Dr. A. H. Brewer (October, 1907), Mr. Ivor Atkins (October, 1908), Dr. G. R. Sinclair (September, 1909), Sir Walter Parratt (November, 1909). With our present number we give a portrait (reproduced from a painting) of César Franck, also seated at his organ.

STICK asks 'whether it is advisable at a full rehearsal to conduct all the four parts (S.A.T.B.) singing all the time, or should attention be paid to separate parts?' This would depend upon the choralsists' knowledge of the music. Every difficulty should be studied by each part separately. If this is never done, it is often the case that mistakes escape a conductor and become stereotyped. Tact is called for in order not to make separate-part practice tedious to those not singing.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BARKING.—The Choral Society gave a concert at the Baths, on January 13, the chief feature of which was Gade's Cantata 'The Erl-King's Daughter.' The choir gave evidence of the careful training they had received from their conductor, Mr. Stanley C. Attwood, and the orchestra, led by Miss Alberta Flahey, gave efficient aid. The solo vocalists were Miss Blanche Belsham, Madame Ethel Dyer, and Mr. David Evans. The second part included the overture 'Raymond' (Ambrose Thomas), Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to Music,' Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' March, and Eaton Fanning's 'Song of the Vikings.'

We are reminded by several readers that the date of the death of Chopin given in our January issue in answer to a correspondent is incorrect, in view of the discovery by Miss Janotha, of a birth certificate that gives the date as February 22.

M. D. C.—In respect to your inquiry about the song 'Guy Fawkes,' made in the January number, Mr. Frank Kidson writes: The song 'Guy Fawkes, or As it might have been,' is the cleverest production of that clever song-writer, Thomas Hudson, and was first brought into publicity in or prior to the early thirties. The tune to which Hudson set the lyric was a famous melody that had served a similar purpose for many a comic production. It retained its original title and chorus, 'Bow, wow, wow!' This tune survived as late as 1868 or 1870, when it was wedded to a music-hall ditty, the purport of which was 'By studying economy I live like a lord.' The song with its music has been published in sheet form many times. Its most recent publication is in 'English songs of the Georgian period,' edited by Alfred Moffat, with notes by Frank Kidson (Bayley & Ferguson).

The opening verse of the song is:

I sing a doleful tragedy, Guy Fawkes, that prince of sinisters,
Who once blew up the House of Lords, the King and all his Ministers,
That is, he would have blown them up and they had all been cindered,
Or seriously scorched at least, if he had not been hindered.

Bow, wow, wow, etc.

No doubt Albert Smith sang the song in private; it was just the sort of thing to appeal to him, but he was never accustomed to sing at 'Tea Gardens.'

Many answers are held over owing to pressure of space.

THE MUSICAL EDUCATOR.

A LIBRARY OF INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC

WRITTEN BY EXPERTS.

FIRST PAYMENT, 1s. 6d.

The aim of “The Musical Educator” is to supply in compact and interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

MARK HAMBOURG, “The Piano and how to Play it.”

EDWIN H. LEMARE, “The Art of Organ Playing.”

MADAME MARCHESI, “The Teaching of Singing.”

JOHN DUNN, “On Playing the Violin.”

DR. F. H. COWEN, “The Art of Conducting.”

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In the “Musical Educator” every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that the “Musical Educator” is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE

“The ‘Musical Educator’ is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent.”

Dr. CRESER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

“We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions.”

ALFRED R. GAUL'S PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF
LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will pass muster as largely useful, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each composed with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.
Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneity, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"It is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthy the study of choral societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pontypool Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

Voice Parts, for use of Choral Societies, each, 1s.

SIXTEENTH THOUSAND.

THE TEN VIRGINS A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"The choral writing in 'The Ten Virgins' is alone something to be thankful for, and, as we have intimated, it is only one of the many musical virtues of the Cantata."—Leamington Chronicle.

"Bow AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to enquire every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works, is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—The Musical Times.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each 1s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.
(Ent. Stationers' Hall.)

The loan of instrumental parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

"Gounod's 'Redemption' appeals to the public largely on account of the words with which the music is associated, and the same can certainly be said of 'The Messiah.' In each case the music, however, is undoubtedly a powerful factor, and the words being not only impressive, but also familiar, the listener is deeply affected. . . . Then, to speak only of Gounod's work, it is strong because it is sincere. A gifted composer, by thoughtful and deep study of the sacred story, can illustrate it in tones effectively, but more convincingly if in true sympathy with the subject—in other words, if he be religious, using that term in its widest sense. And Gounod, like Bach, and in modern times Liszt, was of a serious cast of mind, and possessor, moreover, of a strongly emotional nature."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1909.

"If allowances are made for the state of popular musical thought in his day, and for the undoubted sincerity with which Gounod adopted a style that suited his nature, it is possible to consider his 'Redemption' in many respects a work of high art. Melody in itself, if dissociated from unsuitable surroundings, will never fail to appeal, and grand choral effect, when secured by skilful methods, will always give pleasure. The audience that gathered on Saturday evening to hear the 'Redemption' performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, showed by their number and their interested attention that the work still retains its hold."—Morning Post, March 1, 1909.

MERBECKE'S MUSIC

FOR THE

HOLY COMMUNION

EDITED, WITH AN ORGAN ACCOMPANIMENT, BY

CHARLES VILLIERS STANFORD.

"The Plainsong has been carefully compared with the original, and, in translating it into modern notation, the note values (which are so vital to the due declamation of the words) have been scrupulously preserved. . . . The melody should be sung in unison and in free time. Accents have been placed over the important notes, which require a stress in order to make the meaning of the phrase clear. Marks of expression are added in the organ part only, and occasional alterations of men's and boys' voices are suggested for the sake of contrast and variety."—C. V. S.

BASIL HARWOOD.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

This edition of Merbecke's Communion Service is based on Rimbault's reprint of 1871, after a careful comparison with a copy of the original edition of 1550 belonging to the Library of Christ Church, Oxford. The Plain Song is presented as nearly as possible in the form in which it first appeared, only such changes having been introduced as are required by the altered wording of our Prayer Book.

NEW SACRED SONG
SUITABLE FOR LENT.THE NAZARENE
BY JOSEPH H. ADAMS.

I stood on the hill of Calvary,
As the sun was sinking low,
And thought of all the wondrous things
That happened long ago;
And as in contemplation
I gazed upon the scene,
I saw the Saviour of the world,
The gentle Nazarene:
I thought of His compassion,
His love for sinful men:
I thought of dark Gethsemane,
And all He suffered then:
I saw Him in the judgment hall,
In robes of shame arrayed;
And love and grief welled in my heart,
And kneeling there I prayed:—
O loving Saviour, by Thy bitter anguish,
By all Thy love for our sinful race;
Grant Life Eternal, O Lord Supernal,
Hear us in Heaven Thy dwelling place.

STUDIES IN FUGUE

BY

C. H. KITSON

M.A. (CANTAB.), D.MUS. (OXON.)

Musical News: "A very admirable book on an aspect of Fugue which is seldom met with—the compositional as distinguished from the constructional. ... There is not a superfluous sentence in the work; everything is apt and to the point, and abundantly illustrated by means of copious musical examples. While commending Dr. Kitson's book to the attention of those who wish to write artistic and musical fugues, especially for examination purposes, we also congratulate the author on producing a work which is of high value. It is one which we have read with a great deal of pleasure and profit."

MARKING SCHEMES.

CHORAL CLASSES ... (Quartets, &c.	A Accuracy of Notes and Time 10	B Tone, Balance, Blend, Intonation 20	C Attack, Pronunciation, Enunciation 10	D Expression, Pace, Rhythm, Interpretation 20	E General Effect 20	Total 80
SOLOISTS (VOCAL)	A Accuracy of Notes and Time 10	B Tone, Voice, Quality, and Production, Intonation 20	C Attack, Pronunciation, Enunciation 10	D Expression, Pace, Rhythm, Interpretation 20	E General Effect 20	Total 80

In the January issue of The Record we printed a full marking scheme for use at competitions. We reprint here a portion of the scheme (omitting heads and marks for pianoforte, violin, orchestras, and action songs), in order to facilitate reference. The following opinions on the full scheme are sent by well-known adjudicators and conductors:

PROFESSOR GRANVILLE BANTOCK.

The scale of marks which you have drawn up for use at competition festivals and elsewhere is based upon your valuable practical experience, and is entitled to serious consideration. I should not hesitate to recommend its general adoption.

MR. DAN PRICE.

In my opinion the scale of marks you give in your last number is about as useful and practical as one could devise. The marks apportioned to the various groups of qualities seem to me to be in right proportion and sufficiently analytical for both adjudicator and competitor. More detail or sub-dividing would have made the work of adjudicating very laborious, and lengthy as regards time, which every experienced judge knows must be avoided. In conclusion, I may state that I always advocate the exact scale of marks you have given.

MR. HARRY EVANS.

The conditions of present-day competitions make it imperative that a scheme of marking should be adopted, in spite of any feelings one may have that the quality of a musical performance cannot be accurately assessed in figures. Personally I have found the scheme on page 173 to work satisfactorily, though in the case of big choral competitions, when the music makes great technical demands, as well as more than ordinary perception on the interpretative side, a maximum of 100 would be more comprehensive (besides having the advantage of definite relative percentage), and this would be made up by the addition of 10 to accuracy and 10 to expression, pace, rhythm and interpretation. The great advantage to the competitor is that the relative position in the competition is accurately assigned. The old plan was to announce the winners, and let the rest fight it out as to their relative positions, which meant that each unsuccessful competitor (whilst thinking he ought really to be first, were it not for the stupidity of the judge) consoled himself with being second. The scheme is sufficiently sub-divided for all purposes, but even as it stands, considerable care and experience will be necessary in marking to ensure the best choirs having the highest total. There have been instances of "totting up" resulting in the wrong people getting the prize, but this must surely have been due to a "fad"—a wrong note or momentary lapse in intonation having so unsettled the judge that he docked an otherwise good performance under each heading, and that pretty liberally. In solo competitions, especially when the entries are very numerous, the marking scheme is invaluable, always assuming that the judge is not a slave to the marks.

MR. DAVID JENKINS, Mus. Bac., Aberystwyth.

I have adopted a shorthand of my own when adjudicating. I prefer registering my opinion in words, but I add figures at the end of my observations, so that I can see at a glance the relative positions of competitors. If an adjudicator cannot, immediately after the competition has closed, give the relative positions, I think he is a hopeless case. It is more educative to the competitors to mention such and such a page, or passage, where the intonation was doubtful, the tempo hurried, or the reading incorrect, than to use figures. The scale of marks suggested by you is fairly distributed, but those for accuracy and intonation should be more elastic, so that they may be raised or lowered according to the difficulty of the piece selected, and here I find that a hard and fast rule as to figures fails; hence the advantage of using words to define the exact position. I have had the pleasure of co-adjudicating with some of the chief musicians, English and Welsh, and although some of them used figures, the result was the same at the end. I remember officiating with Dr. Walford Davies at Abergavenny, and at the request of the committee he adopted a similar plan to yours, while I followed my own, and I found that we placed all the competitors in the same relative positions. My experience is that practical musicians very seldom disagree as to the rendering of music, but in judging musical compositions I have found them at sixes and sevens.

MRS. MARY A. BOURNE.

(Conductress of the Barrow Glee and Madrigal Society, winners of the Blackpool Challenge Shield, October, 1909.)

I am of opinion that adjudicators' impressions of performances can be more readily, accurately, and satisfactorily expressed by figures than by words. I have found the scale of marks you give to work well in the choral and soloists' classes of competition festivals. I think the heads of analysis in each class are quite the correct ones, grouped rightly, and all that are necessary to form part of an excellent marking scheme.

MR. GRANVILLE HUMPHREYS.

I think it would be difficult to improve upon your marking scheme; though, of course, for the greater satisfaction of competitors, and whenever possible, figures should be supplemented by verbal and written criticism of the performances.

MR. J. W. ALDOUS.

(Conductor, Lancaster Choir, winners of Morecambe Challenge Shield.)

From considerable experience with the larger musical festivals, I think that adjudicators' impressions should be registered by figures, not words. The scheme detailed in the January Record has been well tried, and is, I think, as good as can be devised.

MR. FRED. W. BLACOW,

(Conductor, Salford Vocal Society.)

In my experience as adjudicator and adjudicated, I have found the "scale of marks" by figures the fairest and surest way of arriving at the comparative values of musical performances, both choral and instrumental, solo, and in bands and choirs. The marking scheme given by you is an admirable one and, in the usual run of competitions, effective; but I am of opinion that in the highest classes of competitions, such as the challenge shield classes for both male and mixed-voice choirs, at Blackpool, Morecambe, Southport, &c., there ought to be a separate mark for "interpretation." Either the 20 marks for D should be divided into: Expression, pace, rhythm, 10; interpretation, 10; or expression, pace, rhythm, 10; general effect, 10; and interpretation, 20. The choirs who compete in these classes are differentiated from the other classes by their musicianship. The artistic interpretation by the conductor is the feature of greatest value in the highest classes, and ought to have special attention in the judging and a separate marking in figures. Is it not possible to curb the "singing conductor"? He must not sing in sight-singing, and ought to be barred in pieces also.

MR. E. HITCHON.

I think the marking scheme the best arrangement that could possibly be devised, for I am sure it would be impossible for an adjudicator to sum-up finely every little detail of sixty or seventy renderings of a song, and carry it through, and discriminate at the end without the use of figures. As to the number of figures used, it is all a matter for the judge himself. I remember being adjudicated by Mr. Moody, of Ripon Cathedral, and he only used a total of forty. But he could arrive at his conclusions quicker and better than by words alone. So far as marks and remarks tally, I think it is by far the best arrangement.

MR. JOHN JAMES.

(Conductor, Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society; Nantwich Orchestral and Choral Society.)

That figures should be used is, to me, a sine qua non. I regard it as impossible to record all the various shades of interpretation in mere words; adjudicators are but human, and unless they are possessed of phenomenal memories, together with perfectly balanced minds free from the excitement of the competitions, such a practical scheme as that contained in your last issue is the only trustworthy means of demonstrating a thorough insight on the part of the adjudicator into the work of competitors. It has often been said—and with some truth—that competitors show more real knowledge of the music than the adjudicators, hence the need for much care and a system which may record the finest detail. I do not advocate any less than eighty marks in instrumental or vocal classes, nor would I interfere with your marks under their respective headings.

MR. W. TATTERSALL.

I think it is not possible to improve the scheme of marks you have proposed, except perhaps that more marks might be allowed for "attack, pronunciation and enunciation"—say fifteen. The pronunciation of some of the choirs is very provincial.

MR. IVOR ATKINS.

(Organist, Worcester Cathedral.)

There can be no question, to my mind, as to the enormous advantage that figures have over words in recording one's impressions accurately, and the scale of marks you print seems to me admirable. It is just a question whether, in view of the very great importance of rhythm and the noticeable lack of it that so many competitors show, something more might not be done to vitalise English music by "starring" it, i.e., by marking it separately. In the pianoforte classes I do not see any advantage in giving 20 instead of the usual 10 for accuracy. As it is disturbing to an adjudicator to have a change in the full marks under any particular head, I should adhere to ten for accuracy and add 10 for "use of pedals," and so preserve 80 as a total of marks.

MRS. MARY LAYTON.

I have looked very carefully through the scale of marks in the Record, and think it admirable. It is evidently the result of great experience, and will be most useful to those needing help in the very difficult task of registering their impressions fairly and completely. Personally I should like "Production" added to group B in choral classes and quartets, and of course there are other smaller points, but they could all come in under "General Effect."

I shall be very glad to use this scheme myself, for it is more compact as well as more comprehensive than the one I have hitherto used.

DR. SINCLAIR.

(Organist, Hereford Cathedral.)

I consider your given scale of marks excellent, and I have worked by it at many competitions. I suggest one addition which I think is of importance—for choral classes, unaccompanied—that, in addition to "Intonation," choirs should be marked for "retaining pitch." The two to be kept quite distinct in separate columns. For practical reasons in saving time (a very important thing in a long festival), I am against having more than eighty for the total, more than five columns, and fifteens instead of tens and twenties.

(Other letters are held over.)

MORRISTON.

December 25, 27.

This was the fortieth annual Eisteddfod and concerts in connection with Tabernacle Church. In the chief choral contest, the Llansamlet Choir was an easy first. The "Second Choral" and "Male-voice" were won by the Carmel Choir and the Morriston Male Choir respectively. On Christmas evening a Welsh concert was given, when several Welsh airs, arranged by Mr. D. Emlyn Evans, were rendered by the Tabernacle Congregational Choir, and were warmly received.

CHESTER.

December 27.

The twenty-first Christmas Eisteddfod attracted good entries and large audiences. Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated in the music sections and awarded prizes as follows:—

Soprano.—Miss Carrie Hastings.
Contralto.—Mrs. R. T. Hammond.
Tenor.—Mr. Tom Morris.
Baritone.—Mr. L. L. Powell.
Mixed-voice Quartet.—Orpheus, Chester.

THE BLACKPOOL FESTIVAL, 1909.

The Report of the adjudicators on the festival held last October has just been published. It is probably the most remarkable document of its kind that has ever been issued. It fills over eighty pages of closely printed matter, and gives detailed reports on the performances of the 659 vocal and instrumental soloists and the eighty or so choral and other musical organizations that took part in the festival. Some of them make general remarks that will be read with interest by a wide circle. The following are extracts:—

SIR CHARLES VILLIERS STANFORD.

I was very delighted by the tone, the technique, and the interpretative ability of the competing choirs. They gave me the impression of having studied a far wider repertoire than the pieces chosen for the competition, and I may express a hope that this wise method of training will continue, for if competitions resulted in the work of such organizations being centred solely upon the test-pieces, mischief instead of benefit must result in the long run. The high general average of musicianship made it clear that no such influences exist now, and the excellent results lead one to hope that they will not develop in the future.

I should like also to mention most favourably the generally excellent enunciation of the words, a point of the highest importance, which marked a striking advance on the choral singing of past times.

Might I express a hope in the interests of the vocal training of the choirs, that in future, in the choice of the a cappella music, more regard should be paid to the limitations of the human voice? In all examinations I look upon it as a mistake to try and discover what examinees can not do, in preference to finding out what they can do. Some of the test-pieces were so difficult from an unaccompanied vocal standpoint that they suggested having been written for instruments upon which the unprepared chords and complicated progressions could be accurately struck. The voice is not a keyed instrument, and nothing can be more injurious to it than to encourage it to strain for and get near to difficulties which are almost, if not quite, insuperable. Such difficulties are, it is true, to be met with in the works of many great composers, but for a meeting like yours they would be inadvisable. Choirs of such excellence as I heard at Blackpool could give the best account of any difficulties, however great, provided that they were of a vocal character; but it is as dangerous for the well-being of their voices (both individually and collectively) to attempt impossibilities which would baffle a choir of picked musicians, as it is unsatisfactory for the judges and the audience to listen to their truly amazing efforts to surmount them. In steepchasing the obstacles are not of a nature to ensure the falling of all the racers, and the prizes are not given to those who miss a jump by a foot over those who miss it by two feet. If they were, the horses would suffer, and such races would be stopped in their interests. So it is with your fine northern singers. Give them, therefore, the best music you can find, but only that which is really vocal, and which will improve their voices rather than strain them. Their best qualities will show all the more if trained upon such material; it will make for the best tone-colour, and for the expression of the greatest intelligence, and will minimise bad or uncertain intonation and falling in pitch. For this reason your choice of the Palestrina Motet was admirable, but curiously enough that, the most purely vocal work of all, was the least successful in performance in every single case. Simple as it seemed, it was the hardest to perform characteristically and adequately. A good and persistent dose of this type of music (and there is a vast treasure-house of it in England) will do more to develop the best qualities of your choral singers and to imbue them with the highest artistic feelings, than any amount of amazing feats of tackling intervals and chord changes which are instrumental rather than vocal. Moreover, that type of music can only be rendered in that compromise known as the tempered scale, where every interval has perforce (as on the pianoforte) to be a little out of tune. The pure scale, that most valued possession of the voice and of the stringed instruments, must be sacrificed under such conditions; and it should not be forgotten that so modern a great master as Wagner always insisted on the pure scale as the true foundation of the best choral singing, illustrating it splendidly himself in "Parsifal," and in his edition of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater."

May your enterprise go on and prosper, orchestrally as well as vocally. You may help the country on this road of progress by encouraging orchestral bodies, which are in no way behind your present choral combinations; and with that development will come a vast widening of the musical horizon throughout the country. For you are educating audiences as well as performers, and of such an endeavour only good can come all round.

DR. MCNAUGHT.

Among the numerous debatable questions that arise in connection with the far-reaching operations of the Blackpool Festival, there are none that present more scope for discussion than that concerning the character of the music chosen as tests in the advanced choral sections.

It will be generally allowed that these tests have always been chosen, not because they were difficult, but solely because of their artistic importance, which was to a large extent assured by the reputation of their composers.

It is undeniable that one of the results of the imposition of these tests has been the evolution of remarkable choral technique and skill in interpretation. This demonstration of capacity to cope with great difficulties has in its turn tempted composers to experiment with new tonal idioms, which again are employed, not for the purpose of imposing difficulties, but in order to explore new paths.

The question now is, how far these explorations into what sometimes seems to be a nebulous region are to be tolerated or encouraged.

The difficulties under consideration are of two kinds, although they are much involved with one another. First, there are those connected with the physical capacity of the voice as an instrument; and second, there is the more important matter of the abilities of the choralists to conceive the effects asked for and to memorise them.

Is it not possible for composers to discover innumerable new tints of combined tone and new nuances of rhythm, without imposing tests that are the despair of conductors and choralists? I believe it is. The Music Selection Committee of the Festival should use its great influence to bring such music into existence. The Festival has done much for musical art, and I daresay it will do even more.

MR. HARRY EVANS.

I must confess to having been taken completely by surprise at the dramatic contralto competition. Knowing only too well the excessive demands of the test-piece, "The Swimmer" (Elgar), upon the technical and temperamental resources of the singers, one would not have been surprised or disappointed had there been only two or three fairly adequate renderings. But when very good performances succeeded one another, and the depths of the emotional side of the poem were so effectively revealed, I could not help feeling that this was indeed a rare experience and privilege for an adjudicator; and as I stated publicly, we had the most emotional singing here that I have experienced during my connection with the Blackpool Festival.

The remarks of the other adjudicators will be given in our next issue.

A list of dates of competitions for 1910 was given in our January issue. New settlements are as follows: Blackpool, October 18 to 22 (five days), and that for Keighley, October 22 and 29.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE COMPETITION RECORD.

DEAR SIR,—I was greatly interested in your remarks, on p. 127 of your December number, concerning "Da bist die Ruh." Why do we never get this expressiveness in children's pianoforte playing? Surely the fearful drudgery entailed by the absurdity of the demand for scales and arpeggi from memory and the horrible work it necessitates has something to do with it. When shall we have an artistic examining body? Your note "gives one furiously to think." If one could only do something to cure the evil!—Yours,

A PIANOFORTE TEACHER.

The syllabus of the Liverpool Musical Festival (competitive) for children, to be held on Saturday, April 23, is now ready. This event has become an important one. Hitherto, under the fostering care of Mr. R. T. Edwards, the well-known conductor of the Liverpool Village Choir, it has attracted many talented young performers and some of the finest young people's choirs in the country. The standard of execution being so high, the festival must have exercised widespread influence. The coming festival will, we trust, be well supported. The adjudicators are to be Dr. Coward, Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, and Mr. Wilfred Jones.

To my dear Friends the Choir of St. George's United Free Church, Edinburgh.

VETERAN PIANISTS.

If at forty you think you are too old to regain or to perfect your piano-playing without practice, send for the "Veteran Pianists" series of letters, from players of 50, 60, and 70 years of age who have done so under the Macdonald Smith System; also for the account of his success from a beginner of 41. This System is complete in every particular of Touch and Technique, and is as successful with the amateur as with the professional concert player. The full Course of Lessons by post costs £3 3s., and there is now a special new Course for Beginners at the same fee. For opinions of pupils, read "Light on Pianoforte Playing," which Mr. Macdonald Smith, 19, Bloomsbury Square, W.C., will be pleased to send free by post to any pianist.

THE SECRET OF SIGHT-PLAYING.

Good Sight-Players will tell you that, when playing at sight, their fingers seem to fall automatically and instinctively upon the right notes, and they are not conscious of any mental exertion.

This ability to play readily at sight can be acquired as a result of years of daily practising for many hours daily, or a much greater proficiency can be attained with only three months of about fifteen minutes' daily practising. In the latter case, this can only be done by the aid of my System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing, particulars of which will be sent free to any pianist.

TESTIMONIALS.

"Your splendid method has worked wonders with me, and pupils have commented upon the improvement in my playing."
Dublin. R. W.

"My general progress from the first lesson has been most marked; there can be no doubt I have improved most in connecting the symbols with the muscular actions, as before starting your Course I usually had to sort out my fingers, so to speak, and that has now been all done away with. On the whole my improvement has been most satisfactory, and it is not too much to say I am more than satisfied."

MR.

GEORGE CHARLESWORTH

(BASS-BARITONE).

wishes to announce that, in order to avoid confusion with another Bass vocalist bearing the same surname, he has decided to be known professionally as

MR. CHARLESWORTH GEORGE.

The following are a few of the Press notices upon Mr. George's singing at his recital at Æolian Hall last October:—

MORNING POST.

Mr. George Charlesworth's singing was notable for his good articulation, but to this virtue he adds the natural gift of a baritone voice of considerable resonance and useful quality, and sufficient technical skill to leave him free to follow the dictates of his temperament. He showed a suitable appreciation of each item of the well-varied programme chosen for performance. His readings of airs from operas by Mozart, Massenet, and Verdi, and a number of short songs, placed his capacity for interpreting their meaning beyond doubt, and his phrasing of the air "Vision Fugitive" alone was sufficient to establish his claim to musicianship.

STANDARD.

Mr. Charlesworth's voice is a bass-baritone of a fine resonant quality throughout, and he sings with a sincerity and dramatic insight that should serve him in good stead should he ever decide to turn his talents to the interpretation of opera in English. Both Henschel's "Young Dietrich" and the "Credo" from Verdi's "Otello" showed
Mr. Charlesworth to be a singer who has the capacity of expressing himself intelligently, forcibly, and convincingly.

COURT JOURNAL.

There is something more than the makings of a fine artist in Mr. Charlesworth. His voice is not only of a grateful and equable quality throughout, but he sings with a dramatic intuition and nervous force that cannot fail to be of very material service in the future.

REFREEE.

Mr. Charlesworth has a fine bass voice of extensive compass. His readings testified to dramatic perception, and clearness of articulation was a pleasing feature of his singing.

YORKSHIRE OBSERVER.

A musical event of some local interest was the successful London debut at the Æolian Hall of Mr. George Charlesworth, a Shipley vocalist, of whom more seems likely to be heard. He submitted a large choice of songs and arias by Mozart, Purcell, Schubert, Verdi, Massenet, Puccini, Tosti, Jensen, Lehmann, and his own master, Chilver-Wilson, and furnished an ample test of an exceptionally good voice of considerable range and fine ringing qualities. His appeal to his London audience was assured from the first, and not many aspirants to musical honours meet with as flattering and as promising a reception.

ROBIN OVERLEIGH

(BASS-BARTONE).

"ELIJAH" (Weybridge, April 26). "The performance was specially noteworthy for the fine interpretation of the outstanding rôle by Mr. Robin Overleigh. This singer ranged up and down the entire gamut of the emotions. He was in turn supplicating, dramatic, derisive, passionate, declamatory, despairing, serene. His voice accommodated itself to every mood, and its fine timbre responded readily to each new demand."

ANTONIO STRADIVARI

HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice." The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

FREDERICK CHOPIN.

There seems no reason for doubt that Frederick Chopin was born at Zelazowa Wola, near Warsaw, on February 22, 1810. The entry in the local church register, discovered by Miss Janotha, is somewhat obscure because it apparently gives the above date as that of the baptism, but the entry elsewhere is dated April 23.

Nicholas Chopin, the composer's father, was a native of Nancy in Lorraine, and was therefore a subject of France. He left Nancy for Warsaw in 1787. This migration is partly accounted for by the fact that he was the son of a Pole. At Warsaw he met, and in 1806, married Justina Krzyzanowska, a daughter of a noble but not wealthy family. She bore him three daughters and one son. Both parents were cultured and devoted to intellectual pursuits. Frederick in his infancy soon displayed musical talent, the development of which was entrusted to Adalbert Zywny, a Bohemian, who had settled in Warsaw, and is said to have made 'a fortune' by giving pianoforte lessons for three florins (eighteenpence) per hour. Frederick's progress was rapid, and at eight years of age he was a virtuoso sought after by the neighbouring aristocracy. Even thus early he began to compose. Soon after this period he took lessons in composition from Joseph Elsner, who was obviously a competent and far-seeing man. He observed the original tendencies of his pupil, and in a letter to another pupil said:

Leave him in peace, his is an uncommon way because his gifts are uncommon. He does not strictly adhere to the customary method, but he has one of his own, and he will reveal in his works an originality which in such a degree has not been found in anyone.

Chopin's opinion of his two and only teachers was expressed later on as follows:

From Zywny and Elsner even the greatest ass must learn something.

In 1825 Op. 1, 'Premier Rondeau in C minor,' was published, and in 1830 the 'Là ci darem la mano' (the duet in Mozart's 'Don Giovanni') variations (Op. 2) appeared. It was of Opus 2 that Schumann wrote in 1831 in enthusiastic admiration, and used the celebrated phrase 'Hats off, gentlemen, a genius.' In 1828 Chopin visited Berlin, Vienna, and other towns in Central Europe, exhibiting his skill and maturing his powers by contact with other musicians. In this year he wrote the 'Sonata in C minor,' known as Op. 4, but not published until 1851, two years after his death. This work exhibited weakness rather than strength, and therefore cannot be regarded as representative of his peculiar ability. He soon realised that the true bent of his genius found freer vent when it was unfettered by forms and anything savouring of pedantry. In 1829 Chopin fell desperately in love with Constantia Gladkowska, a pupil at the Warsaw Conservatorium, but although the passion lasted a year or two it did not survive his absence on a long tour. Yet the episode had considerable influence on his compositions. Paris was visited in 1831, and here Chopin met Kalkbrenner, the then famous pianoforte teacher, only to decide not to study with him. After much success as a performer, he heard Field, who was a forerunner, but scarcely in any sense an instructor of Chopin. Field's opinion of Chopin was that he was un talent de chambre de malade, a criticism which (as Professor Niecks says) makes one think of Auber's remark that Chopin was dying all his life. Berlioz and many other contemporary musical lights were now in Chopin's circle. Yet with all the aural experience he enjoyed of the best music of the period, he assimilated little or nothing that did not fit in with his own idiom. His compositions now developed in boldness and originality, and he began to stir the critics. Rellstab, an eminent writer of the period, thus delivers himself of his feelings regarding the Mazurka (Op. 7):

In the dances before us the author satisfies the passion (of writing affectedly and unnaturally) to a loathsome excess. He is indefatigable, and I might say inexhaustible [sic], in his search for ear-splitting discords, forced transitions, harsh modulations, ugly distortions of melody and rhythm. Everything it is possible to think of is raked up to produce the effect of odd originality, but especially strange keys, the most unnatural positions of chords, the most perverse combinations with regard to fingering. . . .

If Mr. Chopin had shown this composition to a master, the latter would, it is to be hoped, have torn it and thrown it at his feet, which we hereby do symbolically.

And Moscheles remarks:

Where Field smiles, Chopin makes a grinning grimace; where Field sighs, Chopin groans; where Field shrugs his shoulders, Chopin twists his whole body; where Field puts some seasoning into the food, Chopin empties a handful of cayenne pepper. . . . In short, if one holds Field's charming romances before a distorting concave mirror, so that every delicate expression becomes coarse, one gets Chopin's work. . . . We implore Mr. Chopin to return to nature. . . .

Those who have distorted fingers may put them right by practising these studies; but those who have not, should not play them—at least, not without having a surgeon at hand. . . .

I like to employ every free hour in the evening in making myself acquainted with Chopin's studies and his other compositions, and find much charm in the originality and national colouring of their moti; but my fingers always stumble over certain hard, inartistic, and to me incomprehensible modulations, and the whole is often too sweetish for my taste, and appears too little worthy of a man and a trained musician.

In 1834, at Aix la Chapelle, Chopin met Mendelssohn for the first time. In one of his letters Mendelssohn thus writes of his new friend: 'Chopin is now one of the very first pianoforte-players; he produces as much effect as Paganini does on the violin, and performs wonders which one would never have imagined possible.' Leipzig was visited in 1835, and here there was a remarkable meeting with Mendelssohn, Schumann, Clara Wieck and other celebrities. Later Chopin met Thalberg, whom it is said he absolutely despised. Another tender attachment dates from this period. The object was Maria Wodzinska, but in the end the young lady transferred her affections elsewhere. On July 11, 1837, Chopin came to London for the first time. He stayed only a few days, and did not make a public appearance.

We now reach the period during which Chopin came under the influence of the remarkable and, it would seem, fascinating personality of George Sand. The intimacy of the pair has occasioned much controversy, painful and otherwise. The story is too long to tell here. It is fully told in Professor Niecks's 'Life of Chopin,' vol. ii. Here we have only to do with Chopin the artist, and his achievements.

An acquaintance with Liszt must be recorded. But it came to an abrupt termination. Niecks relates that Liszt told him that the reason was that 'our lady-loves had quarrelled, and as good cavaliers we were in duty bound to side with them.' But the historian seems incredulous.

In 1848, Chopin made a second visit to London. He arrived on April 21, and went at first to 10, Bentinck Street, and later to 40, Dover Street. Although his compositions had been severely assailed, notably in the Musical World, he soon captured the ear of the select circle to which he privately and publicly performed. At the two matinées he gave, he used a Broadwood grand (eight feet long, straight-strung), which is still with just pride exhibited by the firm, at their new premises in Conduit Street. This instrument is even now in good playing condition, and is an excellent testimony to the soundness of the construction of the instruments made by this firm.

During his stay in England, Chopin visited Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Manchester, giving concerts or recitals in each town. He was in London again early in November, but steadily-growing weakness forbade much public work. He complained bitterly of the climatic conditions in 'unbearable London,' and in January, 1845, took his departure for Paris. He retained no pleasurable feeling of England. On the route to Paris he exclaimed to his companion: 'Do you see the cattle in this meadow? Ça a plus d'intelligence que les Anglais.' A hard saying!

His health now rapidly failed, and on October 17 he passed away. Liszt, who saw Chopin soon after his decease, states that his face, which had previously borne the expression of his suffering, now resumed a look of youth, purity, and calm. An impressive funeral ceremony, at which Mozart's 'Requiem Mass' was performed, was held at the Church of the Madeleine, and the burial took place in silence at the cemetery of Père-Lachaise, Meyerbeer and other mourners walking the whole three miles bareheaded. A touching incident was the sprinkling on the coffin, when in the grave, of Polish earth which, enclosed in a silver cup, had been given to Chopin nineteen years before by friends on his departure from Wola.

It is remarkable that, save for about a dozen songs, most of which are of little musical value, Chopin composed only for the pianoforte. It seemed that his musical conceptions were dominated by the pianoforte keyboard, and the possibilities of its manipulation by ten fingers assisted by the pedal. A good deal of his music demands a subtle kind of rubato inexpressible in notation. Berlioz said that Chopin could not play strictly in time, and Sir Charles Hallé related to Professor Niecks an account of a dispute between him (Hallé) and Chopin, as to whether the latter played his 'Mazurka' in four-four instead of three-four time, and although Chopin was at first reluctant to admit the change, he was ultimately convinced. One cannot help remarking that in the indefiniteness of rubato many of the performers of Chopin's music leave the composer entirely in the shade. Dr. Hadow, in his second series of 'Studies in Modern Music,' points out that the tonality of Chopin's music was to some extent affected by that of Polish folk-songs, which are often written in one or other of the ecclesiastical modes.

We read that Chopin was very fastidious in his method of composition. He would spend weeks in writing and re-writing a single page. How much more fluent and confident are even some of our youngest composers in these advanced times!

Many able writers have expended their eloquence and ability in expounding the distinctive characteristics of Chopin's style. The influence of Chopin over pianoforte technique and composition are admitted by all to have been very great.

On these points the following authoritative opinions, which we are fortunately enabled to place before our readers, will be read with interest.

MR. EMIL SAUER.

When you ask what Chopin and his immortal works mean to me, I find mere words inadequate to the full expression of my feeling of almost reverential appreciation of that great master. While I am seated at the pianoforte, he is ever my inspiration. Of all the gods who have showered countless jewels on our pianoforte literature, he remains the one at whose shrine I ever tender heartfelt thank-offerings on bended knee. 'Doux et harmonieux génie'!—graceful and deserved tribute paid to Chopin in the opening of Franz Liszt's noble biography of the musician. That tribute finds its echo in my heart. 'God of the Pianoforte,' Rubinstein fittingly calls him in his work, Die Kunst und ihre Meister. Never was the language of praise, albeit with flowery epithets, more justly applied than to the genius of Chopin, the dreamy Minnesinger, who, now sobbing with passion, now mourning for his country, and again vibrating with melodies worked up to a wild enthusiasm, has brought delight and happiness to millions.

In the greater forms of musical expression (Pianoforte concertos, works in Variation form, &c.) Bach, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann alone surpass him. As tone-poet, master of colour and creator of sound-effects—such effects as were completed and considerably extended by Franz Liszt—no one else comes near him. In vain you seek his equal. Works, full of attractive melody, like his Preludes, Nocturnes, Impromptus, Etudes, Ballades, Scherzos, Waltzes and Polonaises, stand alone and unchallenged. The depth and tragedy, too, which speak to us from the two Sonatas (I should prefer to give them the description 'Quasi una Fantasia'), the F minor Fantasia, the Barcarolle, the Polonaise-Fantasia, &c., are typical of the skill, power, and 'infinite variety' of the great composer.

For a proper interpretation of Chopin's muse and a complete understanding of his inner meaning, we must not look to the traditional German pianists, but to those whose tastes are cosmopolitan, their perceptions acute, their manners polished, and their powers of expression cultivated and refined. In short, the true exponent of Chopin's work must be one to whom music is not science but Art, who produces his music, not with studied calculation and mechanical intelligence, but with that heartfelt earnestness which distinctively marks the true virtuoso. Unfortunately, the number of those who count it no penance to play in public, who idolize their pianoforte, and lovingly caress its keys, making them speak in clear, bell-like tones, is extremely limited. They are the 'peculiar faddists' (wunderliche Käuze) who, through a single mishap in a whole evening, an over-strong accent or a pause too short, have a sleepless night. No composer demands more careful treatment in his works, round which are woven artistic arabesques like garlands of flowers, than does Frederick Chopin. The adequate interpretation of his compositions requires extreme accuracy, subtle handling, and loving care of each individual note, with a true sense of sound and colour, accompanied by an artistic freedom in performance aided by the possession of a faultless technique. For these reasons, those who master the pianoforte 'as musicians rather than as pianists'—a new phrase, but rapidly growing in popularity—suffer disastrous shipwreck on the rocks concealed in Chopin.

In our own times, when snobbery, which affects to despise naïveté and melodic invention, which rushes on at high-pressure to hyper-polyphony, cacophony, and a chaos of dubious experiments; in these days of sad decadence, when Art is measured by bushels, when anarchy holds the majority, and musical mathematicians and engineers are triumphant, there is, of course, much sympathetic shrugging of shoulders for pianoforte virtuosos of the old school. Chopin in heaven above looks down deprecatingly on the maltreatment so often accorded his works in concert hall and salon.

PROFESSOR FREDERICK NIECKS.

Chopin is undoubtedly one of the most exquisitely poetical musicians the world has seen, and if the stress is laid on 'exquisitely,' and the qualification 'romantic' added, it may be unhesitatingly said that he was not only one of the most, but indeed the most poetical musician the world has seen. His superiority among the post-classical composers for the pianoforte as to originality and beauty of style and matter is universally recognised. The influence exercised by him on the development of music generally is, on the other hand, too much overlooked. He was a creative and inspiring power not merely in pianism, but also in music at large. To be convinced of this we have only to realise the difference between Chopin's harmonic resources and kind and degree of expressiveness, and those of his predecessors. Original as Schumann was, he was greatly influenced by Chopin. On Liszt the latter's influence was, of course, much more powerful, for Liszt's originality as a composer was less, and his familiarity with his fellow-pianist's compositions greater. But Wagner, too, must have been strongly influenced by the Polish master, whether directly or indirectly does not matter. No doubt the chromatic in the texture and the psychological and intimately subjective may be said to have been in the air at that time; but Chopin was indisputably the first to give a strong impulse in that direction. Chopin owed much to Poland—to the country, the people, and the folk-songs and folk-dances; but Poland owes infinitely more to him. Although a patriotic Pole, he was neither an average nor a typical Pole. Nations imagine that they produce their geniuses. That, however, is mere foolish self-complacency and vain-gloriousness. Geniuses are gifts. Poland had as little to do with the making of Chopin as Italy, England, and Germany with the making of Dante, Shakespeare, and Goethe. Genius is the result of a felicitous but fortuitous concurrence of circumstances. Chopin's pianoforte style is as such an ideal style—the nature of the instrument and the nature of the style are co-extensive. This could not be said of Liszt's pianoforte style, which is more many-sided but less pure. Chopin's pianoforte style is also a virtuosic style. Virtuosity, however, is there as a means to a higher end, not for its own sake. No pianist-composer's music is so much played as Chopin's, and no composer's music is so rarely well played. In fact, if the present state of matters prevails much longer, the public must lose its belief in Chopin as the most poetic of pianist-composers.

MR. TOBIAS MATTHAY.

I am asked to say a few words as to Chopin's influence on pianoforte technique. It would, of course, require a volume to answer fully the question. Chopin's beneficent influence on pianoforte playing and pianoforte writing is indeed incalculably great; and although it is true that that influence is immensely strong as regards technical novelty and improvement, it is still greater from a purely musical point of view, for no one has used the instrument to express feeling so intimately as he has done. As regards technique, his strength lies in the fact that he has more accurately gauged the potentialities of the instrument than anyone has done before or since—we must put him even above Liszt himself in this respect, in spite of all the marvels that giant wrought.

Chopin's success in thus making his musical and poetic invention synchronise so perfectly with the acoustical and mechanical possibilities of his instrument must be attributed, in the first place, to his infinitely fine musical ear, which forbade his writing the inappropriate.

It is difficult to determine exactly how far his own particular ways of key-treatment (touch or technique) influenced his invention, or how far his poetic feeling compelled him to gain his particular playing-technique, but the results are clear enough. The more salient features of the pianistic progress he wrought are found in the enormously greater delicacy and variety of tone he demanded in his cantabiles, the musicality and often the extreme lightness of his passage-work, and the laying-out of this in note-groups beyond the octave limit, and his extensive use of chromatic passing-notes; and perhaps more notable still than these points, his revelation of the immense possibilities of the Rubato element, and his constant but subtle use of the damper-pedal.

With regard to his cantabile no doubt his invention was here greatly influenced by his own technical habits. From the internal evidence of his music, the remarks of his pupils and the shape of his hand, it is conclusively proved that he well knew the use of what we now term 'flat finger' weight-touch, a singing tone produced by a perfectly elastically used finger in conjunction with release of the whole arm, thus admitting far greater beauty and variety of singing-tone than that of the earlier touch methods. Again, his own playing clearly influenced his passage invention, a passage-technique quite original as regards a lightness and swiftness before undreamt of, as for instance in so many of his wonderful filigree cadenzas—a lightness obviously to be attributed to his having thoroughly mastered those problems of key and muscle which we now sum up under the heading of 'Agility touch.' We may admit that these improvements in pianoforte treatment had been in a measure led up to by earlier composers, yet Chopin leapt leagues ahead of them.

But what we have to thank him most for is the deep poetic feeling underlying all his music. Except in his very earliest works we never find him writing a passage for the mere sound of it, or the mere playing of it. However brilliant the rush of sounds, they are always written as a direct and inevitable expression of his mood or feeling. It is because he never swerved from this, his ever-present purpose to express feeling through the musically beautiful, that he became and has remained the greatest pianoforte writer, and that his music will for ever glorify our instrument.

MR. FREDERICK CORDER.

It has always seemed to me that Chopin has not yet received adequate recognition as harmonist. Until about a generation ago he was looked upon with something like contempt by those fine crusted old musicians like my teachers Hiller and Macfarren, both of whom openly declared that music had said its last word with Mendelssohn. Even the broad-minded Prout only ventured to give two insignificant illustrations from Chopin in his harmony book. Theorists regarded him as a writer of elegant drawing-room music on the same plane as Henselt, but addicted to a sad misuse of those hateful chromatic chords. The people who could only play his easiest Nocturnes and the A minor Valse used to cry fié! upon him for being so sentimental, forgetting that these pieces were just the 'pot-boilers' by which he won the affections of the pianists. Now I come to think of it, when I played the F minor Fantasia at my examination for the Mendelssohn Scholarship in 1875, there was only one English musician—Arthur Sullivan—out of a committee of fifteen who knew anything of the work.

Chopin arrived at a fortunate time. The romantic tendency in music, initiated by Spohr and Weber in opera, was beginning to make itself felt in abstract music. In an incredibly short space of time the diatonic track of Mozart and Beethoven was obliterated by the chromatic experiments of Schumann, Liszt, and Wagner. Incited by their example, Chopin distanced all his contemporaries in the ease with which he manipulated the new progressions, and especially in the marvellous grace with which he crowned them with melody. However intricate the harmonic web, Chopin's melody never lacks charm—charm of a tender and always refined kind. Austerity was a mood he never knew. From the marvellous Mazurkas to the great Ballades you can find no page that is not absolutely attractive. It is interesting to compare his Op. 1—a Hummelesque Rondo—with the later works and to note how quickly the chains of dominant sevenths and Spohr-like progressions of diminished sevenths on a dominant pedal were abandoned in favour of combinations of the two which appeared magically novel. The very first of the Mazurkas has such a passage:

He alone possessed the secret of these progressions, so natural, so obvious to us now, yet which no one has successfully imitated. In the E flat Nocturne no familiarity can rob that return from the dominant key of its delightful flavour:

in the same vein, but yet more romantic, is the return to the subject in the slow movement of the B minor Sonata :

One might quote dozens of examples as striking as these, yet all different: the B flat major Prelude, with its ingenious chromatic accompaniment figure; the majestic C minor Polonaise, with its theme in the bass and resultant strange harmonic effect; the unparalleled pedal point in the Coda of the Barcarolle; but perhaps above all the amazingly original first Scherzo in B minor. It is not generally known that this piece was published under the title of 'Le Banquet infernal,' a title which proved too shocking for the drawing-room. But it explains the weird character of the piece, and those terrific augmented sixth chords on the last page. The demoniac character given by the passing-notes in the arpeggio passages is wonderful, and the peaceful middle section (usually exaggerated out of all sense by performers) is in the highest degree artistic.

Towards the end of his life Chopin recognised more clearly the power which a real mastery of counterpoint bestows. The result of his studies may be noted in the growing polyphonic character of the last works, the Barcarolle, the Polonaise Fantaisie and the last two Nocturnes. Had he attained to his 'third period,' it is pretty certain that he would have bequeathed us a wealth of wonders: it is even possible that he might have experimented with the orchestra, which up till then he had hardly thought about. But this is not very likely, since he found the best setting for his ideas in the most limited of forms. That a man could exhibit such endless variety of invention in such unpromising ground as the Mazurka and Polonaise afford, is to my mind the highest evidence of his greatness. I could discourse for pages on his codas and concluding cadences alone; but it is needless when their beauties are at everyone's reach. It is a very superficial remark to say that Chopin is sentimental: all chromatic progressions convey a greasy, sickly impression; but can the writer of the A flat Polonaise, the first and third Scherzos, the Allegro de Concert, and many such dashing compositions be adequately described by such an epithet? Surely not.

M. VINCENT D'INDY

in his 'Cours de Composition Musicale,' Book II., first part, says :

With Chopin's work we perceive what has been since called the pianistic style, a style of which the effects were, and still are, in many ways deplorable. All the compositions for pianoforte which up to now we have examined remained, in fact, exclusively musical, whether signed Bach, Rameau, Haydn, Beethoven, or even Schubert: that is to say, the legitimate care for instrumental effect was always subordinate to the claims and exigencies of music. During the romantic period, however, we pointed out the growing influence of the concerto style, manifesting itself principally by the unusual extension of the trait agogique, or touch of virtuosity, serving as conclusion to the first exposition in movements of the Sonata type. Through that, two very serious errors crept into pianoforte music, of which Chopin exaggerated the effects in proportion to his insufficiency of genuine musical education :

1. Notes selected for advantageous fingering, and not for the architectural logic of the work ; 2. Entire passages written solely for virtuosity, and playing no useful rôle in the balance of the composition.

Of his four Sonatas, that in B minor (Op. 58) is the most remarkable as regards musical invention. All feeling for construction and of co-ordination of ideas is unfortunately lacking; but for the most part these ideas themselves are truly resplendent with melodic wealth.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE

had an uncanny experience in connection with the well-known 'Funeral March.' He thus tells us the true version of the story :

When I was living in Florence, I made the acquaintance of a young musician—pupil of the well-known pianist, Signor Giuseppe Buonamici—who, although bearing an Austrian name, 'Struve,' was, I believe, of Welsh origin. In course of time I became intimate in the little Struve circle, which consisted of mother and son—and a pet dog, Fido.

In 1883, I had to leave for London, and on the day previous to my departure I took one of my usual walks with my young friend. The great mental depression under which he was suffering was obvious, and after a while he confessed that he could not shake off a premonition of sudden and violent death. No reasoning or banter had the least effect upon his settled conviction.

He then told me that he intended to take his mother to Casamicciola (near Naples) for the summer months, and invited me to be their guest on my return from England. The kind offer was tempting, and my half-promise to avail myself of it was cordially accepted.

On the very morning upon which I left London, on my return, I had the news of the catastrophe in Casamicciola, and on my arrival in Italy I learned the following facts : On July 28, 1883, the inmates of the Hotel 'Piccola Sentinella' retired, after dinner, to the salon. Young Struve was requested, as usual, to play to them. His selection of music, Chopin's 'Funeral March,' did not, however, meet with the approval of one of the company—a Marquis Capellini—who, remarking that he 'declined to be made miserable by the piece,' descended into the garden. Two minutes afterwards came the crash, and collapse of the house; and of the many who were at or near the pianoforte that night, not one lived to tell the tale. So sudden must have been the end that Struve was found still grasping the last chord he had played: a piece of falling cornice had pierced his skull. His mother was also killed.

Once or twice I have read more or less incorrect versions of this incident: but of course in no case could there have been any reference to the weird foreboding of impending disaster which my unfortunate friend confided to me.

M. VINCENT D'INDY ON CÉSAR FRANCK.*

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

Few musicians have called forth sounder criticism in their generation than César Franck has done, and few have been more accurately 'placed' by contemporary criticism. Writers like M. Derepas and M. Camille Maclair have stated for us the intellectual and emotional essence of his music with singular penetration, and in language of unusual eloquence; while M. d'Indy and M. Paul Dukas to name these two alone have shown very clearly where Franck stands in the story of the evolution of musical form. His whole work, indeed, is so lucid, so transparent, that criticism could hardly go wrong about it. A man may like the music or dislike it, according to his temperament; but he cannot be in any doubt as to the message of it, or the quality of the personality from which it springs. Franck represents a type of imagination that had not previously appeared in music, though we have had it frequently in painting, in literature, and in philosophy. Not, of course, that his exact parallel can be found, for these precise correspondences do not exist between minds working in the different arts. But if the resemblances are not absolute, they are often unmistakable; we need only to avoid the error of supposing that a particular musician resembles one particular poet or painter, instead of two or three of them. There is a good deal of Raphael in Mozart, for example; but there is a good deal also of Fragonard and Watteau and Boucher. César Franck, as every one exclaims at his first acquaintance with his music, is a mystic; and before him, mysticism had hardly found voice in music. Schumann comes near it here and there in his 'Faust'; but Schumann was too essentially a child of the German romantic revival—the men of which saw the Middle Ages through the slightly distorting veil of their own Teutonic sentiment—to be able to attain the pure simplicity of soul that medieval mysticism at its best exhibits. There is mysticism, of a sort, in 'Parsifal,' but it is not the genuine mysticism of Franck. Wagner's revolt against the world is that of a man who has lived too much in it and become exhausted by its temptations and its gratifications; the body is weary, and in its lassitude it draws the mind down with it. In Newman's 'Dream of Gerontius,' again, and in Elgar's, we are as far as in 'Parsifal' from the mystic frame of mind that Franck represents. Such mysticism as there is in the work is a revolt against the harshness or the incomprehensibility of the outer world; Gerontius has seen the difficulty of life, has felt the anguish of doubt and the cold sweat of fear; and his aspiration towards the Eternal is the cry of the prisoner for release. Here, as in Wagner, we feel the modernity and the temporality of the mood. Franck, on the other hand, is the mystic pur sang, and of all time. Like Maeterlinck, he is not terrified at life, and does not fly from it; he accepts it serenely and almost blithely, the good fortune of his temperament enabling him to see in it a harmony that it does not contain for more fretful, though possibly more sensitive souls. This is the genuine mystic nature. Men like Wagner are mystics only at a particular time of their lives, and as the result of subtle transformations in the physical tissues, that bring with them transformations of thought. The mood comes, at some time or other, to most men who have spent themselves excessively upon life and are glad to escape from a pressure that they can no longer bear; and the phenomenon has been common enough in certain epochs of history, when great numbers of men, weary of the flesh and its phantasms, have thought that by fleeing to the desert they could flee from themselves. Men like these are only mystics by the force of circumstances; like the monk in Anatole France's 'Thais,' the fundamental nature of them remains unchanged. A particular metamorphosis of tissue in Wagner brings 'Parsifal' into being; but we may be quite certain that if, after the work, some elixir of youth could have been injected into his veins, he would have written music and poetry that was as much the negation of 'Parsifal' as 'Parsifal' is the negation of 'Tristan' and 'Die Meistersinger.' Emotional veerings of this kind would have been impossible to Franck. He was of simpler tissue than Wagner, and he was made all of a piece. His mysticism is himself—not the chance product of a life spent in this or that way, but the substance and the colour of the stuff that was in him from his birth. He was a mystic by election, not by circumstance. The serenity and simplicity of his outer life reappear in his art. Had he been a medieval Fleming, he would have dwelt like other mystics, in a hut in a forest, not because he was disgusted with the world and weary of sinning in it, but because in this way he could best pour out the simple gladness of a heart that found the earth, on the whole, a thing of beauty and harmony; as Spinoza, humbly polishing lenses for a modest living, had more of the true essentials of the universal force revealed to him in his broodings than any of the flaming, restless soldiers or politicians or merchants around him. Had Franck been an artist, living in the early days of Italian art, he would, as M. d'Indy points out, have painted pictures like those of Filippo Lippi or Giovanni da Fiesole—simple, pious and meditative. M. d'Indy, again, rightly sees an analogy between him and the builders of the French cathedrals of the 13th century, with their modesty and sincerity of soul, their eurythmy of line, the quiet but profound rapture that breathes through their work. Had Franck written prose or verse, it would have been something in the style of Maeterlinck, or Jacob Behmen, or Ruysbroeck; had he been a philosopher, he would have given us something of the serene contemplativeness of the 'God-intoxicated Spinoza.' Simplicity and serenity in his case, as in that of so many other mystics, do not mean superficiality of thought. Great passion may mean only a great stirring of mud, and a great whirling of the apparatus of thinking may mean only a barren ploughing of sands; while awe may be struck into us by apparently the simplest thought if it be phrased by a poet who is a master. In Franck, as I have tried to point out, the simplicity is merely that of a soul at complete harmony with itself and with the world. As M. Camille Maclair has phrased it, in his own luminous and sensitive style, 'No one else has that faculty of suave and sensuous mysticism, that unique charm, that serene plenitude of fervour, that purity of soaring melody, above all, that power of joy which springs from a religious effusion, that radiant whiteness resulting from a harmony at once ingenuous and ecstatic. There is no severity in this evangelical mysticism. . . . Bach is formidable; he thunders, he has the robust faith of the Middle Ages; his rhythm is colossal; even his gaiety is as alarming as the laughter of a giant. Franck is enamoured of gentleness and consolation, and his music rolls into the soul in long waves, as on the slack of a moonlit tide. It is tenderness itself; divine tenderness borrowing the humble smile of humanity.'

Franck's style is in keeping with his outlook; it is rounded, suave, harmonious, abhorring harshness or excess of any kind. It is one of the most individual of styles, and so one of the easiest to recognise wherever we hear it. It is a question, indeed, whether it is not just a little manneristic now and then. This is a point to which M. d'Indy might have given fuller consideration. The degree to which 'manner' can be indulged in before becoming 'mannerism' is hard to determine, and it would be incautious to generalise upon so subtle and elusive a subject. We are inclined to look upon mannerism—that is, the tendency to think too frequently and too automatically in certain formulas of style—as the qualifying mark of the second- or third-rate men, and to regard the first-rate men as being free from it. But every first-rate man has some peculiarities of style which we should call a mannerism or a trick in a smaller one. Beethoven, for example, is very fond of making a transition from one main group of ideas to another by repetitions of the same melodic fragment in notes of gradually increasing rapidity. Wagner's method of piling up an effect by successive reiterations of the same figure in different parts of the scale is well known. Should we call these mannerisms or manner? Perhaps the latter. But take Brahms's addiction to certain rhythmic devices, such as inserting one or two triplet groups into a passage in duple rhythm, and vice versa. Sometimes we should call this the Brahms manner, and sometimes the Brahms mannerism, according to whether we felt that the device grew naturally out of the thought, or represented the mere obeying of a nervous habit—of the kind that makes a man keep twiddling a button of his coat while talking to you, the button not being a strictly necessary factor in the conversation to anyone but the victim of the habit. "In other cases the line of definition is quite easy to draw. No one would hesitate to say, for example, that Mendelssohn's constant use of the feminine phrase-ending is a mannerism, or that Grieg's trick of working through a series of chromatic harmonies over a descending bass is another. This may constitute the Grieg 'manner,' it is true; but in this case it has degenerated into mannerism. On the other hand, Beethoven works mostly with themes formed of small intervals, while many of Strauss's best melodies move by widely separated intervals, and traverse a far larger arc than Beethoven's; yet no one would call either of these individual traits a Beethoven or Strauss mannerism. César Franck's style has an unmistakable physiognomy of its own. It is always recognisable by its fondness for suave harmonic and melodic transitions, often obtained by the immediate repetition of an idea with the slightest possible alteration. Thus in the 'Variations Symphoniques' we have:

in the 'Chasseur Maudit':

in the Quintet:

If space permitted, many other examples might be quoted to illustrate these peculiarities of Franck's melodic and harmonic structure, especially the latter—for the main characteristic of his harmony is this soft flow of one tint into another. Yet we rarely have the impression of the style ceasing to be manner and becoming mannerism. Now and then, it must be admitted, we do feel this; though on the whole we accept the style as the natural vehicle of expression of the man, as Wagner's was. The suavity of the melodic curves and the melting shades of the harmonies are, in fact, the perfect counterpart of the substance of Franck's thought. The music never gives us the impression of a weakling, as so much of Grieg's chromaticism does; it is simply that to everything that Franck does he gives a Correggio-like suavity of line, and bathes it in a softly luminous glow. Hence it is that his art never hurts us; even in its most passionate moments it descends like a balm on the soul. And for the same reason, no matter how ingenious the structure or the handling, one is never conscious of the labour that has been put into it. The wheels never creak, the scaffolding never slows; everything flows easily and purely, like a broad and lucent river through a rich and smiling landscape.

French critics claim that Franck has created the symphonic form of the future, finding the solution of the problem that music has had to face ever since the beginning of the 19th century. Here one cannot follow them so readily. M. d'Indy finds a peculiar excellence in the cyclic style of structure adopted by Franck, who thus grafted, as it were, what is best in the Wagnerian and Lisztian system of the poetic transformation of themes upon the classical sonata form, thus ideally blending the old and the new, the abstract and the poetic, the formal and the free. He loves to base his instrumental works upon what M. d'Indy calls a 'germinative idea'—a kind of leit-motiv, but without the too frequent scrappiness of the leit-motiv, that pervades the whole work. M. d'Indy shows how the principle operates in the D major quartet; but anyone who does not know that work can study the principle in the more familiar Violin sonata. With all deference to the opinion of so many eminent critics, I cannot, for my own part, feel that the system is so fruitful or so final as they believe. It is surely a hybrid, and, like all hybrids, with an insecure tenure of life. It is indeed necessary to find for modern music some principle that shall make it as coherent and logical as the classical symphony. It is clear, too, that this must be achieved mainly by thematic reminiscences that shall perpetually rouse in the hearer a sense that what he is now listening to is a living outgrowth from what he heard a few moments ago, while at the same time variety of treatment or of association shall give him an ever-fresh interest in the themes. This was, of course, the principle of Wagner. But it seems to me that if it is to be applied to instrumental music pure and simple, with full success, the work must either be contained within the frame of a single movement, or, if we are to have the usual three or four symphonic movements, the thematic reminiscences must be supported by something in the nature of a programme, however slight. Beautiful as the Quartet and the Violin sonata are, will any man say that the re-entry of the old material in the later movements carries an unmistakable message with it? Within the single movement the composer may do what he likes in the way of reminiscence; but when an interval of time has elapsed and a new movement has been begun, we inevitably ask ourselves why a composer should re-introduce a motive that has already had its say, instead of inventing fresh material. I do not contend, of course, that he must not do this, but merely that he should make it absolutely clear to us that it was the best thing he could do; he must show us, that is, the logic of it. Now without a programme of some kind, this is difficult. In Franck's Symphony the bare knowledge that the vigorous second subject of the first movement symbolises 'Faith' is sufficient to make us accept every re-entry of it without question. The barest hint of this kind will suffice. Without such a hint the imagination is forced to fall back upon purely musical reasons for the re-introduction of an old theme in a later movement, and generally these reasons seem insufficient. Is there any really valid reason, for example, for the re-entry of the theme of the Adagio in the Finale of Brahms's first Violin sonata? If Brahms had chosen, that is, to fill its place with new matter, would any of us have been conscious of a deficiency? In Franck's Quartet, again, do the various repetitions of the themes of the Adagio and the Scherzo in the Finale tell their own story, or even any intelligible story? The device is borrowed, of course, from Beethoven's ninth Symphony, where the composer seems to try first one of the earlier themes and then another for his Finale, and finally to reject them all in favour of a new one. But as Beethoven does it, and under those particular circumstances, the procedure is perfectly logical; we have the hint of a developing poetic scheme to guide us. But in Franck's Quartet there is no such hint, and so the repetitions, having neither a musical nor a poetical justification, do not make their meaning clear. In Elgar's Symphony the difficulty is generally—though perhaps not always—surmounted in the ablest way. The central theme is so fully and impressively stated at the beginning that we instinctively fasten upon it and feel that it will later on give us the clue to the whole work. This impression is heightened by the various fragmentary references that are made to the theme, and clinched by the triumphant statement of it at the end. Here, although the symphony is in four movements, we are conscious of its unity, feeling, as with the fifth Symphony of Beethoven, that we have the key to a number of episodes and vicissitudes that would otherwise be only bewildering. In Franck's Quartet and in the Violin sonata, in spite of the wonderful beauty of the music, we cannot rid ourselves of something of this bewilderment. On the other hand, when he works within the limits of one continuous movement, as in the 'Prelude, Chorale and Fugue,' the method of reminiscence is most effective and thoroughly logical. The one-movement form is surely the form for the future. Franck, then, in this respect merely marks a transitional stage in the history of instrumental form.

THOMAS AUGUSTINE ARNE: A BICENTENARY APPRECIATION.

BY FRANK KIDSON.

What was the state and condition of English music in the year 1710? I do not ask what was the appreciation of music in England, but how it was regarded as an English national art, when, on March 12 of that year, was born, as son of Thomas Arne (the genteel upholsterer of King Street, Covent Garden), that little mite of humanity that was destined to add to its highest lustre.

To answer our question we may say that, on the whole, it was in rather a poor way. Purcell had been dead nearly fifteen years, though happily not quite forgotten. Dr. Blow had died a year and a half before. Jeremiah Clarke had, in December, 1707, shot himself, and John Eccles, though still alive, had retired from active work. Of the older school of composers, Daniel Purcell was alive, John Weldon also; and Leveridge and Carey were composing, with some other minor lights. Besides these there were sundry English vocalists, and performers on the organ, viol, violin or flute, for the hautboy had scarcely become popular. Many of these found some difficulty in getting a hearing among the crowd of foreigners that thronged London.

William Boyce was a baby, a month old, and was probably mostly in evidence as a vocal performer when his contemporary was born.

Purcell's operas were shelved in favour of the Italian operas brought from Italy by Thomas Clayton. Some of these operas were composed by Italians and others by Clayton himself, and it must be confessed that he made rather a sorry figure in his work.

Handel had not yet brought out his first English work, 'Rinaldo,' though it came in less than a year's time, and a further spell of Italian opera reigned until Master Thomas Arne grew old enough to show that something might be done musically with native talent and theme.

We need not enter very fully into the Arne biography. The details of this have been industriously collected by the late Mr. F. G. Edwards, and the reader has but to turn up the November and December numbers of the Musical Times, 1901, to get some very interesting particulars. Briefly it may be said that his father, Thomas Arne, was an upholsterer in a large way of business in King Street, Covent Garden, and that he had determined that his eldest son should have a professional instead of a tradesman's career. He therefore sent him to Eton, and ultimately young Arne became a lawyer's clerk. Dr. Burney heard from Arne's own lips how, at an early age, music possessed his soul. How he played at Eton on a cracked flute, and attended the opera in the servants' gallery, in borrowed livery. How, also, he played the spinet, with muffled strings, while the rest of the family were a-bed; and how he studied the violin under Festing. The father at last discovered the lad's determination to become a musician, and wisely gave in. Free to make music his profession, he taught his sister and his brother the art, and with much success. The former, Susanna Maria Arne, who married the brutal Theophilus Cibber in haste, had, perhaps, leisure to regret her matrimonial choice: she became a singer and an actress of great merit. She made her second stage appearance in her brother's first opera, and was frequently an exponent of his music.

Arne possessed great originality with a tunefulness that never left him. The stilted Italianized opera was yet in evidence, though the 'Beggars' and the host of ballad operas that followed it had made vigorous protest. The music in these productions was supplied by the nondescript street tunes, selected without a particle of consideration as to appropriateness, and but lamely fitted with verses written to be sung to them. Addison's opera 'Rosamond' had been absurdly set by Clayton, and it was here that Arne got the chance to show what musical stuff he was made of. He wrote fresh music and his sister took the title-rôle in its first performance; this was at the Lincoln's Inn Theatre in 1733. The song that survived the opera was the one by which she made fame for herself and him, 'Was ever nymph like Rosamond.'

But 'Comus' was yet to come, and here Arne reached, in 1738, a high place. Two years after, in 1740, 'Rule, Britannia,' and those exquisite Shakespearean songs from 'Twelfth Night' and 'As you like it' at once raised Arne to the highest rank of lyric composers. No need to repeat the oft-told tale of the occasion which brought forth 'Rule, Britannia,' or to again refute the alleged crib from Handel; no need to enter into discussion whether Mallet or Thomson was responsible for the highfalutin nonsense that Arne wrote his music to. The 'Ode,' as it was called, did not immediately 'catch on,' and it was ultimately—when published 'by particular desire' by a second-rate music-seller—sandwiched between the music for his 'Judgment of Paris' and 'Sawney and Jenney,' a familiar dialogue in 'ye Scotch stile.'

It was at this period, say 1738 to 1750, that Arne was at his brightest, and most winning in his tunefulness. He led the way with dainty and charming airs for Marylebone, Ranelagh, and Vauxhall audiences. The songs themselves were artificial enough, of course. Damon and Philander were false to Chloe or Belinda, or vice versa. Peggy was happy with her rustic-lover, Roger, and discoursed of meads and cows, and so forth, and as a matter of fact the airs followed the lead thus set. They were, however, just suited to the songs, and were perfection for the jingle of the spinet or harpsichord. Some fall into a groove easily, but we have but to compare the unknown imitators of the Arne manner to see how superior the genuine article is. If we accept the little 'curly' character of the tune fitted to the 'Dresden shepherdess' kind of words, we can find a great deal that pleases in the periodical books of songs which Arne published himself, or through John Walsh. His son, Michael Arne, was one of the few to rival the Master in his own craft, as 'The lass with the delicate air' can sufficiently testify.

Arne took himself seriously when he produced 'Artaxerxes.' I am afraid modern audiences would not stand this opera in its fullness. It gradually faded until only 'In infancy our hopes and fears,' 'The soldier, tired of war's alarms,' and 'Water parted from the sea,' were the sole remnants of that once famous production. That the last-named was considered 'genteel' we have the bear leader's testimony in 'She stoops to conquer,' for it shares with the minuet from 'Ariadne' the honour of supplying the music for the bear's dancing. Arne was an English musician—a thoroughly English one—and if we are to believe many people, we never had much native talent that lay in that direction. Still, it seems to me that with all Arne's faults and with all his limitations, and these were but of his age, he should be far dearer to us than many of those foreign composers who supply our concert programmes with lyrics that are either, in translation, sickly sentimental or deadly dull, and whose music cannot have the same appeal to our English temperament. Yet beyond the three Shakespearean songs, 'Blow, blow, thou winter wind,' 'Where the bee sucks' (both more frequently used as test-pieces for children's singing, rather than as concert items), and 'When daisies pied,' what does the average person hear of Dr. Arne's music except 'Rule, Britannia'?

Arne is probably the most representative of English composers of the 18th century, save for Church music. It is true he did little instrumental work that is now known, though Mr. Moffat has resuscitated a Violin sonata of great merit* and it is more than likely that other buried work might be brought to life with advantage. Yet Arne is neglected, and shamefully so. His work has to be culled from old copies, published during the composer's lifetime, and this is accessible only in such storages as the British Museum, or the private libraries of musical antiquaries.

It will be interesting to note how many arrangers of concerts will remember the musician's two-hundredth anniversary, or, having remembered, will make a feature of Arne's music? I fear but few. Yet among the constantly-repeated items there could surely be a little room spared for some of his best music, vocal and instrumental, to let this generation know that worthy music could, at times, come from the brain of an Englishman.

HOW A TRUMPET IS MADE.

By D. J. BLAIKLEY.

III.—TRUMPETS AND HORNS WITH SIDE-HOLES.

It has been demonstrated in the foregoing articles that trumpets and other kindred instruments of fixed lengths are limited in intonation to the natural harmonic scale, and that although from the eighth to the sixteenth harmonic many notes agree with those of the diatonic scale, yet the agreement is far from being complete. But if we reject the various attempts that have been made to derive the diatonic scale from any one root, we can plainly see that from two roots standing a fourth apart, as from C to F (doh to fah), elements may be chosen, some of them being common to both harmonic scales, which give the diatonic scale in its completeness. Thus if we take a horn in C, the 8th, 9th, 10th, 12th, 15th and 16th notes are correct for C, D, E, G, B and C, and the 11th, 13th and 14th notes are incorrect. But supplementing this horn by one in F, a fourth higher, we obtain F, G, A, as its eighth, ninth and tenth harmonics, and thus from two instruments of fixed length we are able to produce the accepted diatonic scale, which may very reasonably be regarded as being derived from two roots or generators. This arrangement, requiring two instruments and two players to produce a scale of only one octave, though scientifically correct, is manifestly inconvenient; and the difficulty would be increased if we endeavoured to fill up the lower intervals of the harmonic scale; for more and more tubes of different lengths, giving different fundamental tones, would be required.

The art of wind instrument making is therefore to a large extent the art of treating a tube of fixed length in such a way that it virtually becomes many tubes of different lengths, giving different fundamental tones, and consequently different series of harmonics. From mediæval days to the time of Bach and Gluck the family of instruments known as Zinken or Cornetti were much used, and these instruments afforded one means of attaining the desired end. They were usually made of wood, with a conical bore, and were played with cup-shaped mouthpieces. By the use of side-holes closed by the fingers, the different lengths referred to above were obtained; these holes were usually seven in number, six for the fingers and one at the back for the thumb. The finger-holes enabled the player to produce a diatonic scale, and by overblowing the compass could be extended to two octaves or rather more. From accounts by Mersenne (Harmonie Universelle) and others, the cornetti appear to have been much appreciated, but as they now have only a historical interest, it will be sufficient to say that they were made of various pitches, covering a range from tenor to soprano. The chief defect of the larger ones was due to the fact that the finger-holes were neither so large nor spaced so far apart as requisite for good intonation. Theoretically a side-hole should be large enough to act as if it were the open end of a tube, but when the finger-holes are small in comparison to the diameter of the instrument, this condition is impossible, and many complications and imperfections result therefrom.

The tenor instrument of this old family of cornets (or Cornetti) was known as the cornou, and for the convenience of fingering was given a slightly serpentine form, thus . The further extension of the length of such an instrument to reach the 8-ft. C, an increase of calibre to yield a bass quality, and a more complete bending or serpent-like form resulted in the Serpent, which is generally regarded as the invention of Edmé Guillaume, a canon of Auxerre, in 1590. The difficulty of placing the finger-holes of such a large instrument in even approximately correct positions was partially overcome by the gradual addition of key-work, but at the best the serpent was uncertain in intonation and unequal in the tone-quality of successive notes. It was in use, however, until comparatively recent times, for the late Sir Michael Costa used it in the performances of the Sacred Harmonic Society; it therefore had a life of nearly three centuries.

About the year 1780, an inventor contrived a modification of the form of the serpent, while preserving its musical (or un-musical?) characteristics. This modification consisted in doubling the tube abruptly upon itself, in the manner of the bassoon. In this form the instrument was widely known as the bass horn or basson Russe, and it became very generally used in military bands.

For the sake of chronological order, the application of side-holes to the trumpet must be parenthetically noted here, and the further development of the bass horn or serpent be made the subject of a succeeding paragraph. It appears that towards the end of the 18th century the cornetto had gradually fallen into disuse, and it became increasingly important to improve the trumpet, or to supplement its natural notes by others which would make its scale more complete. About the year 1795, the instrument maker Weidinger, of Vienna, produced a trumpet with five side-holes, opened by keys or levers, but the idea was probably due to a horn player named Kœlbel. The instruments were much used for a time, but as it is impossible to maintain the true trumpet tone without the bell expansion, and as when the side-holes are open the tone comes mainly from a cylindrical tube, it is not surprising that the popularity of this variety of trumpet was not maintained. One point in the design, however, was distinctly good, and this was the covering of all the lateral holes with padded keys, leaving none to be stopped merely by the fingers; by this means free choice of position for the holes giving the scale became possible, and the application of keys to the bugle (patented by Joseph Halliday in 1810) resulted in an instrument which held an important place in military and other bands until it was displaced by the more modern piston instruments.

To return to the bass-horn. Halary, an instrument maker of Paris, modified its form and proportions, and by using key-work throughout produced an instrument having fairly good intonation and uniformity of tone-quality. His patent was taken out in 1822, and his instrument, known as the ophicleide, and made both as a bass and as a tenor, had a longer reign than the key-bugle, although, like its smaller companion, it has ultimately given place to the piston instruments. The pitch of the key-bugle was usually c , and that of the ophicleide was an octave lower, or C, but practically the lower range of the latter was relatively one octave greater than that of the former, for the first chromatic octave of the bugle began with c , the octave from c to c' not being used, whereas on the ophicleide the pedal octave from C to c was available with chromatic completeness, as the instrument was furnished with eleven or twelve keys. On the bugle, with its practical scale beginning only on the second harmonic, c' , the interval between this note and the third harmonic (g') could be divided chromatically with the five or six keys usually fitted. This use of the pedal octave of bass brass instruments has been maintained on modern piston valve tubas or bombardons, as will be explained in the section to be devoted to these.

On both the key-bugle and the ophicleide there was an 'open-standing' key, by which $B\sharp$ and $B\flat$ respectively were obtained, and for military purposes the ophicleide was also made in $B\flat_1$ with A_1 in the 16-ft. octave for its lowest note. The tone of the instrument was characteristic, though somewhat hollow, and therefore did not blend well with that of the trombones. Mendelssohn, however, employed it so effectively in his 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music that some critics aver that none of our more modern instruments can quite take its place, and with the present desire for every possible variety of tone-colour, it would not be surprising if we were to see a revival of the ophicleide, which, since the death of Mr. Sam Hughes, has been practically an obsolete member of our bands, both orchestral and military.

It is more easy to describe the acoustical foundations of an instrument and its mechanical contrivances than it is to define its characteristics of tone-quality, or even to give it a name that will be generally recognized. The same name has at different times and in different countries been given to different instruments, and the same instrument is known by different names. For instance, the name cornet, as applied to the old instrument with finger-holes, is also applied to the well-known modern instrument with valves, and beyond the fact that they are both blown with the lips, the two have nothing in common. Again, as regards tone-quality: a certain type of tone is regarded as the ideal one for a given instrument in one country, and the same quality would not be appreciated in another. As an instance of this the following remarks of Berlioz may be of interest. Writing of the Gewandhaus orchestra, Leipsic, in 1843, when he conducted a concert there, he said: 'L'ophicléide, ou du moins le mince instrument de cuivre qu'on me présentait sous ce nom, ne ressemblait point aux ophicléides français; il n'avait presque point de son. Il fût donc considéré comme non avenu; on le remplaça tant bien que mal par un quatrième trombone.' Yet we may, perhaps, safely assume that an ophicleide admitted into the Gewandhaus orchestra would at least approach very nearly to the German ideal of the instrument.

IV.—TRUMPETS AND HORNS WITH SLIDES.

Horns, strictly speaking, do not lend themselves to the application of a movable telescopic slide for scale purposes. To make the heading of this section more accurate, a modification of the old schoolboy riddle might be suggested, and to the question 'When is a horn not a horn?' the answer would be 'When it is a trombone.' It is with trombones that we shall be chiefly concerned until the modern valve instruments are considered.

In the preceding section the action or effect of side-holes was considered. By their means we virtually obtain many instruments of different pitches combined in one; in other words, by the successive opening of the side-holes the air-column of the original tube is shortened step by step, and thus different fundamental notes are established, which, with their natural harmonics, can be so used as to give a chromatic scale of from two to three octaves, and on some instruments even more.

With the slide this scheme is reversed. Instead of obtaining new fundamentals by shortening the tube, a telescopic slide is bent or doubled on itself into U form, and by extending this the normal length of the instrument can be increased either by definite stages or gradually to give the effect of the portamento or glide. The great advantage of the slide over any other means of altering lengths, whether by decrement or increment, is that the slide admits of infinite gradations of pitch, so that, to take an instance, the distinction between the major and minor tone need not be lost. On fixed-tone instruments the changing position of the major and minor tones is obliterated: d r m f in C becoming the same as s₁ l₁ t₁ d in F:

whereas on a slide instrument the proper sequence of the major and minor tones can be expressed.

The question is sometimes asked, why is such a valuable means of obtaining just intonation confined to trumpets and trombones? The answer is that the slide principle, from its very nature, is applicable only to instruments which have cylindrical tubing for the greater part of their length. To an instrument such as the French horn, which has a slight though gradual taper, or to the tuba with its wide mouth and rapid taper, the principle of the slide cannot possibly be applied to any useful extent.

The addition of the slide to the natural trumpet appears to have been made about the end of the 18th century. The slide is so placed that it is moved outward towards or under the player's chin by two fingers of the right hand, and recovers its home or closed position by means of a spring. This arrangement of the slide gives a shift equal to a tone in pitch, and therefore its advantage, though limited, is very distinct. It is possible that an increased length of slide, giving a more complete scale, may be adopted in the future, but although attempts have been made in this direction these are not as yet much known.

In the trombone we have the slide at its best, and, granting the condition that the slide principle can only be utilised on instruments of a certain quality of tone (determined mainly by their cylindrical tubing), it is difficult to conceive that any contrivance could be more scientifically and musically true, or better adapted to give the desired results. The early use of the slide on the trombone, as compared with its much later use on the trumpet, is to be accounted for by the fact that, the trombone being used as a bass to the cornetti, its lower notes were called upon, and the necessity of filling up the gaps between the lower harmonics could only be met by the use of the slide. In the oldest instruments of the trombone family, the sackbuts, it does not appear that the slide was capable of an extension of more than a tone and a half or two tones, but from the time of Virdung (Musica Getuscht, 1511) to our own time, the trombone has undergone but little change, and the slides have been of the length required to give every semitone between the second and third harmonics, requiring seven 'positions,' or the home position and six shifts, each shift lowering the fundamental pitch one semitone. Therefore, assuming the instrument to be in C the note  would be the second harmonic, and  would be the third harmonic, of f \sharp and g respectively, obtained from the seventh and sixth positions; i.e., to yield the semitone above c, the second harmonic of C, the instrument must be lowered to F \sharp , so that the third harmonic of this new root or generator may give the note required.

The chief distinction between the trombone and the trumpet, both being instruments of the same general character, lies in this, that the trombone serves as the tenor or bass to the trumpet, the latter instrument having a smaller bell and being played with a smaller mouth-piece, whilst the total tube length, and therefore the harmonics of the tenor trombone in C and of the trumpet in that key, are the same.

Trombones have been made, and are still made, in various keys. For the sake of completeness the whole of the recognized members of the family are here named:

DISCANT TROMBONE,
in b \flat , a, a \flat , or g.
ALTO TROMBONE,
in f or e \flat .

Obsolete.

Rarely used: as a first trombone sometimes replaced by the Tenor in C.

TENOR TROMBONE,
in c or B \flat .

The instrument in B \flat is the most generally used.

BASS TROMBONE,
in G, F, or E \flat .

The G is the usual bass in this country.

CONTRABASS TROMBONE,
in C or B \flat ₁

Very little used, but required by Wagner.

For the bass trombone in E₂, and more especially for the contra-bass trombone, the length of slide extension is so great that double slides have been introduced, by means of which the 'shift' of the B₂ contrabass becomes the same as that of the B₂ tenor, an octave higher.

Occasional Notes.

The full programme of the Leeds Triennial Festival, which will take place from October 12 to 15, is as follows: Wednesday morning.—'Elijah' (Mendelssohn). Evening.—Symphonic poem for orchestra, 'Villon' (Wallace); 'A Sea Symphony,' for soli and chorus (Vaughan Williams); Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C minor (Rachmaninoff), the solo part played by the composer; Orchestral fantasia, 'Don Juan' (Strauss). Thursday morning.—Overture, 'Egmont' (Beethoven); 'A German Requiem' (Brahms); New Symphony (Rachmaninoff), conducted by the composer; Overture, 'In der Natur' (Dvorák). Evening.—Overture, 'Zauberflöte' (Mozart); 'Ode for St. Cecilia's Day' (Handel); Act I., 'Die Walküre' (Wagner). Friday morning.—Symphonic Variations (Dvorák); Ode, 'Wellington' (Stanford); Motet, 'Sing ye to the Lord' (Bach). Evening.—'The Blessed Damozel,' for soli and female voices (Debussy); 'Sea Pictures' (Elgar); Part-songs for chorus, (a) 'Go, song of mine' (Elgar); (b) 'As Vesta was descending' (Weelkes); Symphony (No. 3) in E flat, 'The Rhenish' (Schumann); 'The Wedding of Shon MacLean' (Hubert Bath), conducted by the composer. Saturday morning.—'The Passion according to St. Matthew' (Bach). Evening.—Symphony (No. 4) in F minor (Tchaikovsky); 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin' (Parry); 'Songs of the Fleet,' a new work (Stanford), for baritone solo and chorus; Variations (Op. 36) (Elgar); and selections from Act III., 'Die Meistersinger' (Wagner).

Many of our readers will be interested to know that the library of the late Mr. F. G. Edwards (Editor of the Musical Times from 1897 to December, 1909) will be sold by auction in April, by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson, at their rooms in Leicester Square. A more detailed notice will appear in our April issue. The contents include Alessandro Scarlatti's manuscript of 'L'Olympe Vindicate'; proof copy of the vocal parts of 'Elijah' with Mendelssohn's corrections in red chalk; early editions of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, Passion Music, Cantatas, &c., and some autograph letters from Mendelssohn to Bartholomew, respecting the English translation of 'Elijah.'

The Philharmonic Society has conferred upon Mr. Emil Sauer, in recognition of his artistic merits, the much coveted Philharmonic gold medal, bearing the impression of Beethoven's likeness, which has only been presented to a few most distinguished artists who have repeatedly assisted at the Philharmonic Society's concerts.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Gloucester Musical Festival, held on February 12, under the presidency of the Dean of Gloucester, the following programme was suggested for adoption by the stewards for performance at the September meeting of the three choirs of Gloucester, Worcester and Hereford: Tuesday morning (September 6), 'Elijah'; Tuesday evening, new orchestral work by Vaughan Williams, and 'Dream of Gerontius'; Wednesday (September 7), Symphony in A flat (Elgar), 'Beyond these voices' (Parry), new Organ Concerto (Dr. Basil Harwood), Rhapsodie for alto voice with male-voice choir (Brahms), and 'By the waters of Babylon' (Goetz); Wednesday evening, 'Ode to music' (Parry), new choral work by Dr. A. Herbert Brewer, &c.; Thursday (September 8), 'Tod und Verklärung' (Strauss), 'Requiem' (Berlioz), 'Be not afraid' (Bach); Thursday evening, new orchestral work by Professor Granville Bantock and 'Stabat Mater' (Dvorák); Friday (September 9), 'Messiah.'

Sir Hubert Parry has generously given the sum of £1,500 towards the improvement of the Shire Hall for musical purposes. It is hoped that extensive alterations, both as regards the seating and structure of the Hall and the Orchestra will be completed in time for the Gloucester Festival.

From a programme:

'When shepherds pipe on oaten straws,
And merry larks are ploughmen's clocks;
And turtles kiss the rooks and daws,
And mermaids bleach their summer frocks.'
The cuckoo then, &c.

This is evidently a local printer's idea of sea-side costume. It may be presumed that 'Mermaids' summer frocks' are of watered silk. We commend the line to the notice of Shakespearean scholars, as a new reading of the bard. If to the charms of flowing locks and sweet voice the mermaid adds 'summer frocks,' no wonder the mariner's trade is a dangerous one.

Among the festivals which are to take place during this year's exhibition in Munich, there will be a Beethoven-Brahms-Bruckner Cycle by the orchestra of the Munich Konzert-Verein. This cycle will, as last year, be under the direction of Mr. Ferdinand Löwe (Vienna), and the most celebrated soloists will take part. The following dates have been fixed: August 5, 8, 13, 15, 17, 19, 22, 24, 27, 31, and September 2 and 4. These twelve symphony concerts are arranged for the days when there are no Wagner or Mozart festival performances, and will take place in the new music hall of the exhibition. The prospectus may be obtained on application either to the Geschäftsstelle der Ausstellung, the Landesverband für Fremdenverkehr, the Konzert-Verein München, or the Tourist Office of Schenker & Co., in Munich.

With reference to the article on Chopin in the earlier part of the present issue, it is but just to say that much of the information given therein has been obtained from Professor Niecks's valuable and exhaustive life of Chopin—Frederick Chopin, as a Man and Musician. Many of our readers will be interested to know that this important publication has now been reduced in price to 12s. 6d. It is still issued in its original form and binding, in two volumes.

The Musical Competition Record for March will not be included as one of the extra supplements in the present issue. It will, however, be published as usual in the March number of the School Music Review, and any of our readers who wish to keep the series complete may obtain a copy gratis and post-free on application to the publishers.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

FIRST PRODUCTION IN ENGLAND OF 'ELEKTRA.'

BY RICHARD STRAUSS.

Mr. Thomas Beecham's boldly conceived scheme was inaugurated on February 19, with memorable success. The production of 'Elektra' alone would have sufficed to give distinction to the season. Expectation had been raised to the highest pitch by unprecedented preliminary newspaper articles, many of which gave absurdly exaggerated and inaccurate accounts of Strauss's work. As a matter of fact, the music rarely imposes exceptional strain of attention on the part of the auditor at all accustomed to modern music; and its extravagances, such as they are, occupy only brief periods in a performance extending for an hour and three-quarters.

'Elektra' was first produced at Dresden, on January 25, 1909, and since that time it has been the chief work of its class to challenge the world's verdict. On the whole that verdict has been that it displays Richard Strauss's genius at its best and worst. The story it deals with is a sombre one. It is a Teutonic version by Van Hoffmannsthal of Sophocles' great tragedy. Clytemnestra, with the aid of her paramour Ægistheus, has procured the murder of her husband Agamemnon, and is now in fear of the discovery of her guilt by her children, Elektra, Chrysothemis and their banished brother Orestes. Elektra, who is the embodiment of vehement lust for vengeance, endeavours to persuade her meeker and shrinking sister to kill the guilty pair. Before the design is carried out Orestes, whose death had been announced, appears, and when he learns from Elektra the fearful truth, he resolves himself to avenge his mother's crime. He kills Clytemnestra and Ægistheus, and Elektra, in a delirious joy-dance, falls dead before her horror-stricken attendants. This is the tragic end of the play.

There is only one scene—an inner courtyard bounded by the back of a palace. A sacrificial procession regarding which much nonsense has been written was seen on this occasion only through the opening of the courtyard. There was stage realism, but little of the musical realism we had been led to expect.

The experience of one performance does not justify definite judgment on the art-value of the opera. But it fully sufficed to enable an unprejudiced hearer to feel deeply impressed with the power of the composer to express, less by means of the vocal parts than by the orchestra, the touching, exciting and thrilling situations concentrated in this comparatively short drama. Sometimes, it must be confessed, there were dull moments in which the music seemed to have no obvious association with the text. The soliloquies and dialogues were, in places, unnaturally and tediously long, and the music did not appear to differentiate the characters with sufficient distinctness. As a spectacle the performance was rather monotonous, and not even the conspicuous ability of the exponents of the chief characters could make tolerable the constant conventional uplifting of both hands to express horror and amazement. Strauss makes use of many short themes, and special harmonies to which significance is meant to be attached. These are not of the class to be quickly memorized, but no doubt familiarity with them will deepen the already fascinating interest of the orchestral treatment. If on a first hearing the mind does not easily recall definite musical impressions, it must be confessed that no one susceptible to music could fail to retain some of the ineffable charm of the music associated with the recognition of Orestes by Elektra. This, surely, is one of the most beautiful things in all musical literature. These are random criticisms. There is very much more to be said than can be found space for in our present issue. We shall return to the subject later on.

The cast, with chief characters, was as follows:

Ægistheus	Mr. M. D'Oisly.
Clytemnestra	Frau von Bahr Mildeburg.
Elektra	Miss Edyth Walker.
Chrysothemis	Miss Frances Rose.
Orestes	Herr Weidemann.

The chief burden is borne by Elektra and Clytemnestra. The former is on the stage almost throughout, and the part was splendidly performed by Miss Walker. Frau Mildeburg also displayed great power, and Miss Frances Rose was an able exponent of her exacting part. Mr. Thomas Beecham conducted, and by his success has placed himself in the front rank of living conductors. The band included 115 performers, and the playing was superb. The King and Queen and an overwhelming audience attended. A great and deserved ovation awaited the conductor and performers at the end.

Church and Organ Music.

THE NEW ORGAN IN CHESTER CATHEDRAL.

The authorities of our English cathedrals are rapidly availing themselves of the modern improvements in organ-building, and of this the latest example is to be found at Chester, which can now boast of possessing an exceedingly fine instrument.

The history of a cathedral organ is always of great interest, and many of our instruments of to-day are the result, tonally, of the work of many generations. There is generally some fine old diapason, or flute of peculiarly rich tone, which should be, and nearly always is, retained in the latest 'edition' of the organ: which reminds us of a story told us by Sir John Stainer (of revered memory), bearing upon this point. The organ which Willis built for St. Paul's, in 1872, contained a fine diapason by Father Smith, which Willis so successfully copied that there was some difficulty in distinguishing them. Sir John was fond of showing off these stops, and often did so. But when, after his retirement, the organ was dismantled for rebuilding, to his great surprise and amusement (we can see his genial smile now), he discovered, or rather Willis did, that he had confused the two, and that the supposed Father Smith turned out to be Father Willis! But the story goes to show the still flourishing condition of the art of voicing.

The Chester organ is particularly rich in diapasons and flutes, some of which have stood upon more than one voicing machine. Whatever their tone may have been, it certainly has not suffered at the hands of the eminent firm (Messrs. Hill & Son) who have been entrusted with the reconstruction of the organ. They indeed deserve the greatest credit for the highly artistic manner in which they have accomplished their work. Nearly one-half of the stops are new, while the action throughout is of the latest type, and remarkable for its promptness and response to any demands. The tone is refined and dignified, and entirely suitable to the acoustical properties of the cathedral. The complete specification will no doubt interest our 'organic' readers:

Great reeds	7	Pedal, Great and Swell flue ..	¾
Solo reed and flute	5	Action	8

The wind is supplied by a Kinetic fan, worked by electricity, and placed in a room in the North Transept Triforium. Seven of the pedal stops are placed in the North Transept and played by electro-pneumatic action. With the exception of the two flutes and tuba, the whole of the Solo organ is placed in a separate swell-box. The whole of the Choir organ is placed in the South Choir Aisle and played by electro-pneumatic action. If we might suggest any improvement on this fine scheme, it would be the inclusion of a clarinet in the Solo, the lowest octave of the bassoon, and a sub-octave coupler to Swell. But we can personally testify to the fine balance of tone, especially in the 8-ft. flue work. The diapasons are, throughout, exceedingly fine, and the reeds among the most satisfactory we have heard, and we were much struck with the quality of the tuba and 32-ft. reed. The Swell oboe is an excellent example of soft, musical and equal voicing, and the lowest octave is smooth and free from the 'calf-like' bleat of bygone days. The flutes are remarkable for their variety and beauty of tone.

Altogether we must heartily congratulate Dr. J. C. Bridge on having so successfully consummated his design, and the builders once more for the admirable way in which they have carried out his wishes. The work was brought to a most fitting and satisfactory conclusion by a series of recitals, as follows :

Monday, January 31 -	Dr. Joseph C. Bridge.
Tuesday, February 1	Dr. W. G. Alcock.
Wednesday „ 2	Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne.
Thursday „ 3	Dr. A. L. Peace.
Friday „ 4	Sir Frederick Bridge.
Saturday „ 5	Mr. T. Tertius Noble.

An interesting fact is that of these organists, three, viz., Sir Frederick Bridge, Dr. J. C. Bridge, and Dr. Kendrick Pyne, performed at the opening of the organ erected in 1876.

We sub tend the programmes of the first three recitals. The list will be completed in our April issue.

DR. JOSEPH C. BRIDGE.

- Overture, 'Richard the First' Handel.
- (a) Pastoral Symphony from 'Christmas Oratorio' Bach.
- (b) 'Vigil of the Shepherds' Dudley Buck.

- Grand Fantasia and Fugue for the organ, founded on an ancient Huguenot Theme Franz Liszt.
- Impromptu Elegiac J. Kendrick Pyne.
- Marcia Trionfale Verdi.

On Sunday evening, February 6, in the chapel of St. John's College, Cambridge, under the direction of the organist, Mr. C. B. Rootham, the following music was rendered, and under the conditions of a fine performance amid beautiful surroundings, the occasion was a notable one :

- Organ solo—Toccata and Fugue in C minor .. J. S. Bach.
- 'Stabat Mater' for double chorus (unaccompanied) Palestrina.
- Concerto in A minor for solo violin and string orchestra J. S. Bach.
- Mass in G major for solo voices, chorus, orchestra, and organ J. S. Bach.
- Soloists—TREBLE CHORISTS and Mr. GODWIN HUNT.
At the organ—Mr. W. L. RAYNES.

The name of Samuel Sebastian Wesley will surely live by the memorials of his own raising, but it was fitting that a tablet to his memory should have been placed in the Cathedral of which he was organist. At Winchester Cathedral, on February 5, a notable gathering took place of those connected with and interested in Cathedral music, for the purpose of honouring the memory of one whose work stands out conspicuously among that of English musicians. The inscription is in inlaid metal letters, and runs as follows:—'In memory of Samuel Sebastian Wesley, Mus. Doc., organist of this Cathedral 1849-1864. "Ascribe unto the Lord the honour due unto His Name." ' We refrain from a biographical notice of the great composer, as a comprehensive article appeared in our May number for 1900. It is sufficient to say that all present, whether performers or listeners, were impressed with the importance of the occasion. Among those who attended were the Very Rev. the Dean, the Ven. Archdeacon Fearon, the Ven. Archdeacon Robinson, and many other clergy; Sir George Martin, Drs. F. E. Gladstone and J. Kendrick Pyne (both pupils of Wesley), Dr. Sweeting (Winchester College), and Dr. Champneys, an old Wykehamist. The anthems were 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace,' the last part of 'The Wilderness,' and 'Blessed be the God and Father.' Dr. Prendergast was at the organ, and gave a masterly performance of the 'Choral Song and Fugue' as an outgoing voluntary.

A very interesting letter on the music at St. Paul's Cathedral appears over the initials 'G. G.,' in the Church Times of February 4. The writer is moved by a statement by a former contributor who says, 'The spirit of the great master organist (Sir John Stainer) still hovers over St. Paul's, nor would we wish to change anything there.' Against this it is urged that 'during the last ten years or more a great change of feeling with regard to what is worthy and unworthy in music has spread, and is spreading far and wide.' Our critic, quite good-humouredly, then pleads for a return to traditional unaccompanied music, and between the lines we perceive a dislike to the organ as a means of accompaniment, at least in the way it is used at St. Paul's. Is 'G. G.' aware that he may hear at St. Paul's splendid performances of such works as Palestrina's 'Missa Papae Marcelli,' Eccard's 'When to the Temple Mary went,' and many others of that school, not to mention Tallis and Gibbons? But his special grievance is the Hymn Tune, and though we sorrowfully agree with many of his strictures, yet we feel that Stainer at least has written more than one hymn tune which will live. Why is it that the generality of people will allow the highest development of any art but music amidst ecclesiastical surroundings? Surely a cathedral with fourteen anthems and as many settings of the service in each week of the year may be allowed to represent all styles. To our mind, the singing and organ playing at St. Paul's to-day well provide the inspiration sought by organists and choir-directors all over England, as is claimed for them by 'G. G.'s' opponent.

CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

The annual general meeting of the Choir Benevolent Fund was held in the Chapter Room, St. Paul's Cathedral, on February 8. A highly satisfactory balance sheet was passed, showing that this admirably managed Society is in a progressively flourishing condition. It is, however, to be noted with regret that only six cathedrals contribute an annual offertory to the Fund, and it might be thought that the important assistance rendered to the services of our cathedral and collegiate churches generally by the members of this Society, should call for similar recognition by the respective Deans and Chapters throughout the country. A particularly gratifying feature of the report is the statement made with regard to the kindly bequest in the will of the late Rev. H. H. Woodward, wherein the copyright of certain of his Church compositions has been bequeathed to the Society. The sales arising from these publications have already realized over fifty pounds. Another gratifying feature is the recognition of the valuable services of the indefatigable Secretary, Mr. W. A. Frost, who has now devoted his energies to the good work for over twenty years.

The Huddersfield and District Organists' Association gave their annual dinner on February 4, when Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne, the retired organist of Manchester Cathedral and lecturer to Manchester University, was the guest. Before the dinner, Dr. Pyne gave a magnificent recital on the fine organ in the Town Hall, playing pieces by Bossi, Byrde, Bach, Franck, Salomé, and an 'Impromptu Elegiac' by himself, but the pièce de résistance was a tremendous Fantasia and Fugue on a church theme from Meyerbeer's opera, 'Le Prophète.' This piece consisted of an Introduction, Melody, Slow movement, Scherzo, Fanfare, Allegro, Adagio, Fantasia, Fugue, and Peroration; it lasted quite half an hour, and was magnificently played. His rendering of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G major was noteworthy for its brilliant staccato and accent effects. Dr. Pyne was enthusiastically received by the Association, which had a most successful evening, under the presidency of Dr. A. E. Hull. Dr. Pyne also gave a short recital in the Parish Church after evensong on Sunday, including in his selection Bach's St. Ann's Fugue, Wesley's Diapason movement and Haydn's C major slow movement, and the March in C of Mailly.

We gladly print the following letter sent us by the authorities of Worcester Cathedral, and feel sure it will meet with a ready response from many of our readers:

'3, College Yard,
'Worcester.

'DEAR SIR,—You may have seen in the papers the announcement of the death of the Reverend Herbert Hall Woodward, Precentor of Worcester Cathedral and composer of Church music,—music which, by its melody and devotional character, appeals to so many people who hear it. His anthem "The radiant morn," and his setting to the Communion Service (Woodward in E flat) are amongst the best known of his compositions.

'It has been decided to raise a Memorial to him, and that it should take the form of the re-building of the Choir School of Worcester Cathedral, hereafter to be called the "Woodward Choir School."

'There could be no more fitting Memorial to perpetuate his memory, as the School owed its origin to him, and for twenty-eight years he was a veritable father to the boys.

'It was thought that there are many choirs and churches which would value the opportunity of showing their appreciation of Mr. Woodward's music by making some contribution towards the Memorial.

'Any donation may be sent to either of the Honorary Secretaries:

'REV. H. J. MERCER (Minor Canon),
3, College Yard, Worcester.

'A. H. WHINFIELD, Esq.,
Severn Grange, Worcester.'

Who said the organ is not an instrument capable of expression? At all events there is some one in Australia who can prove the contrary. Hear what a local paper saith:

MR. ———'S ORGAN RECITAL.

'A very large attendance of interested auditors assembled at ——— Anglican Church last evening to hear Mr. ——— give a recital on the fine pipe organ under the lofty roof. As might be expected of one of Mr. ——— character and reputation, the organist played with power and precision and with the confidence of conscious competence. Unfortunately, no printed programmes were available, so that other organists might add the series to their repertoire. For they were mostly gems. Mr. ——— appeared to use chiefly diapason, cremona, melodia, and flute effects, and his handling of the manuals was much appreciated, especially as the stops became more familiar. The volume ranged pretty well from maximum to minimum. The opening selection was massive, and the thunder and reverberation of great gun booms, as they play hide and seek among the caves on some cliff constructed sea boundary, were impressive, the subsequent diminution making the result more marked. Contrasts and variety were not lacking. A delicate air religieux was succeeded by a quaint number with an almost weird monotone foundation. A "singing" lyric, with appropriate obbligato, gave place to staccato crashes, and this to a majestic movement. Then followed a nicely moulded and modulated minor. The two concluding pieces were stirring ones. Exultant streams preceded telling tremolo passages in the one, and this foil was replaced by a grand finale not inaptly described as the "roaring fortes," with rolling, vibrating, pulsating recession.'

The Choir School of York Minster, under the headmastership of Mr. G. A. Scaife, is in a most flourishing condition, and in great request by parents desiring a sound school and musical training for their sons. The boys receive their lessons in musical theory from Mr. Scaife, and their singing tuition from the organist of the Minster, Mr. T. Tertius Noble. Remarkable results have been obtained in the examinations held by Trinity College, all the boys entered having passed with honours.

Before boys are admitted as probationers they have to submit to severe examination as to voice, knowledge of music, &c. (including reading at sight), so that the best boys only are eligible. They then receive two years' training, and must pass further examinations before they can become choristers.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

On Friday evenings in Lent, in accordance with an annual custom of long standing, a special service is held in St. Anne's, Soho, at which is sung Bach's Passion Music (St. John). The opening service of this Lenten season took place on Friday, February 11, and was attended by a reverent and numerous congregation. Shortened Evensong, including the 51st Psalm, was succeeded by the 'Passion' music. The choir, which was augmented for the occasion, was supported by the organ and an orchestra. The Chorales, in which the congregation joined, produced a most impressive effect, and the performance was notable for its devotional rendering and musical excellence, and must have fully satisfied Mr. E. H. Thorne, to whose untiring labours these services are due. It is needless to add that the whole was under his admirable direction.

On Sunday, February 6, an excellent performance of Gounod's 'Death and Life' was given at Brixton Church, by the Brixton Oratorio Choir, which numbers 120 chosen voices. The soloists were Miss Ethel Henry-Bird, Miss Emily Newman, Mr. Ernest Pike and Mr. Thomas Howell. There was a full professional orchestra (principal first violin, Mr. F. Weist-Hill), and Mr. Welton Hickin was the organist; Mr. Douglas Redman conducted with care and alertness. At the same church, on Ash Wednesday, were given Gounod's 'O day of penitence' and 'By Babylon's wave,' and Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus.' The soloists were Miss Marsden Owen, Mr. Frederick Lake, and Mr. E. W. Chittenden, while the chorus parts were taken by the Brixton Oratorio Choir. Mr. Douglas Redman conducted, and Mr. Welton Hickin was at the organ. Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' is promised for Sunday, March 6, at 3.30.

On Monday, February 7, a recital was held in Pembroke College Chapel, Cambridge, under the direction of Mr. Felix Morley. The College Choir was responsible for the choral selections, and a small but efficient body of string instrumentalists lent valuable assistance. Dr. Naylor (Emmanuel College) presided at the organ, while the vocalist was Miss V. Beaumont, a young lady of promise. The chief item in the programme was a setting of Psalm 150 for solo, chorus and orchestra, by Mr. F. W. Morley. This received a very creditable rendering, and is a work which only requires to be known to be widely appreciated.

A very successful performance of Gaul's cantata, 'The Holy City,' was given, with organ accompaniment only, on February 10, at Holy Trinity Church, Southwell, by the choir, largely augmented for the occasion. The chorus of forty-five voices sang splendidly throughout, under the direction of Mr. A. E. Leatherland, who played the accompaniments.

At St. Paul's Evangelical Lutheran Church, Allentown, (Pa.), on Sunday, January 30, a Service of Praise was held, at which the whole of the music performed was selected from the compositions of Mr. John E. West. The anthems included 'Righteous art thou, O Lord,' and the voluntaries were the Allegretto Grazioso and the Postlude in B flat. Mr. West's music is evidently appreciated abroad, as it so justly is in this country.

The funeral of Mr. Samuel Noble, one of the senior 'Gentlemen' of His Majesty's Chapels Royal, took place on February 4, at Kensal Green Cemetery, in the presence of many friends. The service was conducted by the Rev. Canon Edgar Sheppard, D.D., Sub-Dean of the Chapels Royal, and the musical portions were rendered by the choir of the Chapel Royal. The Nunc dimittis was sung at the graveside. Mr. Noble had been associated with the Chapels Royal St. James's and Whitehall for upwards of thirty years.

Mr. Sidney H. Cooper, organist and choirmaster of St. John's Church, Sevenoaks.

Mr. J. P. Davis, articulated pupil to Dr. Sinclair, has been appointed organist of St. Michael's College, Tenbury.

Mr. G. Vincent Evans, organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, Wanstead.

Mr. Robert Tinniswood, organist and choirmaster of All Saints' Church, Friern Barnet.

CHOIR APPOINTMENT.

Mr. S. Mann, bass, Liverpool Cathedral.

MANCHESTER DIOCESAN CHURCH MUSIC SOCIETY.

This Society was inaugurated at a meeting of clergy, organists and choirmasters held under the presidency of the Lord Bishop of the Diocese, on July 16, 1909.

Its objects are 'the help and encouragement of Church music in the Diocese of Manchester, and the promotion of feelings of good-fellowship and brotherhood amongst all engaged in this branch of Church work.' Local centres have been formed at the following places besides Manchester:—Blackburn, Bolton, Burnley, Bury, The Fylde, Lancaster, Leigh, Oldham, Preston and Rochdale. In each of these centres united choir festivals will be held annually, and once in three years each choir will have the opportunity of attending a central festival in Manchester. In addition to holding these festivals the scope of the Society includes: The provision of lectures, meetings, &c., on subjects of interest to Church Musicians; the mutual assistance of neighbouring choirs at special musical services; the formation of a Church Orchestral Society; advice and assistance when asked in the selection of suitable music for choirs; the encouragement of social intercourse amongst members, assistance in the formation of choir clubs (social and athletic), and unions of ex-chorists.

There are two main classes of membership: Ordinary members (clergy, organists, choirmasters and members of choirs) pay an annual subscription of 1s., in return for which they receive a copy of the Service Book for the year, and a bronze badge and card of membership; Associates pay an annual subscription of not less than one guinea.

The essential feature of the scheme is the idea of personal membership. After payment of all expenses any balance will be distributed in the form of 'grants in aid of expenses' (on a percentage basis) to those choirs who have attended Festivals during the year.

The scheme has been exceedingly well taken up, some 140 choirs having already joined, with a total membership of upwards of 4,000. Festivals will be held in the current year in all the centres, and at five churches in Manchester.

The president of the Society is the Lord Bishop of Manchester. The treasurers are Dr. Hill Griffith, 17, St. John Street, Deansgate, Manchester, and Mr. William Heald, Williams Deacon's Bank, St. Ann Street, Manchester, and the general secretary and conductor is Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, organist of Manchester Cathedral.

The award of the judges—Sir Frederick Bridge, Mr. Allen Gill and Mr. Hamilton Harty—in the competition for the prizes recently offered by Dr. Charles Harriss for the best choruses expressing the Imperial idea in music, has now been announced. Thirty-one MSS. were submitted, and the first prize of £50 is awarded to Mr. Percy Fletcher (who also was the prize-winner in another recent musical competition). A further prize of £20 is awarded to Dr. Cuthbert Harriss. The prize choruses will be performed at this year's Empire Concert, which Dr. Harriss will direct.

Reviews.

Symphony No. 4, in G major. By Antonin Dvorák (Op. 88). Arranged for pianoforte solo by Sigfrid Karg-Elert.

Suite for String Orchestra. By W. H. Reed. Arranged for pianoforte solo by Charles Woodhouse.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The neglect that has been suffered by Dvorák's fourth Symphony does injustice to its merits. It has the qualities that bring popularity, and is cast in an artistic mould. Herr Karg-Elert's transcription now brings it within the reach of every pianist who can master its moderate technical difficulty. The intrinsic value of the musical ideas enables the work to survive the loss of its orchestral colouring with but small disadvantage. The main subjects reveal Dvorák in his characteristic moods, sometimes 'racy' and rhythmic, sometimes romantic, and, needless to say, never abstruse. The main themes of the opening movement embody a contrast of moods, being in part solemn and in part gay: it is the second quality that imparts its character to the music as a whole. The slow movement which succeeds is perhaps the most original of the four. An Allegretto grazioso with a graceful, swinging rhythm, performs the functions of a Scherzo; it has a curious Coda. The last movement is instinct with life, and contains many characteristic touches that enliven and sustain the interest.

The outstanding feature of Mr. W. H. Reed's 'Suite' of three pieces for string orchestra is its thematic character, and next in importance is the instinct shown for contrapuntal rather than harmonic treatment. Every now and then the composer gives rein to his harmonic imagination, and with good effect; but usually he gives it a subordinate place in the general design, and consequently his work gains in strength. The movements are entitled 'Idylle,' 'Valse Caractéristique,' and 'Finale.' The first two are charming examples of what their names imply, and the third, unlike many spirited last movements, possesses real 'backbone.'

The Organ, and its position in Musical Art: a book for musicians and amateurs. By H. Heathcote Statham.

[Chapman & Hall, Ltd.]

We have, in the volume before us, a highly successful attempt to present the intricacies of the organ in a language easily 'understood of the people.' It is a book to be read by both musicians and amateurs with instruction and interest. Special attention is given to the construction of the instrument, and all that concerns action and pipes is most clearly and concisely presented. Most interesting, too, are the chapters on the use of the organ in oratorio and in church. The author's high opinion of the late Mr. W. T. Best will of course be fully endorsed by all who either knew that great artist, or are acquainted with his influence on the instrument of which he was so consummate a master. There are, however, a few points upon which we differ from Mr. Statham. On page 5, he says 'a "three-inch" wind is obtained by a pressure which drives the water in the anemometer that distance up the further leg of the syphon-shaped glass tube.' We are under the impression that the distance should be one and a-half inches, when the difference between the two levels would then be three inches. We also totally disagree with the assertion on page 36 that the effect of a contra-oboe can be obtained from an 8-ft. oboe with a sub-octave coupler. Let the author try the 8-ft. and 16-ft. oboes at the Albert Hall, and we are sure he would be convinced.

While on the subject of reeds, we must say that we, as purists in the matter of Bach's music, cannot think of orchestral colouring as applying in any way. Mr. Statham's suggested use of the solo reeds in Bach and Mendelssohn does not commend itself to us.

His argument that 'stone, marble and iron do not assist sound vibrations' seems to us untenable. Does he consider the Chapel of King's College, Cambridge, a bad building for sound? Or would he give the Chapel Royal as an example of one favourable to musical performance? We feel he has mistaken the conditions for those necessary to the speaking voice. There are a few misprints, and we might mention the name of C. Spackman Barker, the inventor of the pneumatic lever, as being wrongly spelt. Also, in some of the musical extracts, notably that of the slow movement of Mendelssohn's 2nd Sonata, there are wrong notes. The addition of an index would have added greatly to the convenience of the reader.

Having had our grumble, we cordially agree with most of Mr. Statham's excellent work. We are, for instance, entirely at one with him in thinking the centre of the screen the best position for the cathedral organ. We also agree that a musical service of praise by proxy, as it may be called, is not by any means so inconsistent with sincere devotion as some unmusical people suppose.

We have read the book with much pleasure, and strongly recommend it to all who, in these days of the apotheosis of the orchestra, still believe the organ to be, in capable hands (and under capable feet!), a logically musical instrument.

Folk-songs from Hampshire. Collected by George B. Gardiner. With pianoforte accompaniment by Gustav von Holst.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This is the third book of the 'Folk-songs of England' series, and some pathetic interest is attached to the work by the recent death of Dr. Gardiner, the collector, who probably only just lived to see the completed work published.

Dr. Gardiner, though a Scot, was an enthusiastic collector of English folk-song, and spent (since 1905) most of his time in Wiltshire, Hampshire, and the adjoining counties gathering up every scrap of folk-song he could come across.

The present work contains sixteen songs of his collecting, and although versions of several of them have been before published, they are all of interest and of some melodic value.

Dr. Gardiner, strangely enough, found traditionally current in the Southern counties of England a great number of songs generally considered as of Scottish or Northern birth. 'John Barleycorn' is one of these, in the present volume, and 'Lord Dunwaters' is a version of a ballad generally associated with James Ratcliffe, the Lord Derwentwater who lost his life, and his estates, in 1715, by following the fortunes of the Old Pretender.

'Sing Ivy' is a pretty version of the well-known nursery rhyme, and among others Dr. Gardiner has included variants of 'The Irish Car,' 'Bedlam City,' 'Young Edwin in the Lowlands Low,' 'Our ship she lies in harbour,' and 'The Squire and the Thresher.'

A once popular song is also present as noted down by Dr. Gardiner: this is the 'Willow Tree.' The words are much in the spirit of folk poetry, but really are by Thomas Dibdin, and with music by Braham; the song was sung in an opera called 'Thirty Thousand,' at Covent Garden, in 1805.

Four dances from 'The Blue Bird.' Composed by Norman O'Neill.

[Elkin & Co.]

An all too-familiar class of sacred compositions has been aptly dubbed 'Kapellmeister' music. Nowadays there is need for some similar term for the incidental music which average conductors of theatre bands think they have special ability and a prescriptive right to supply from their own brains. Such a term would sum up the very qualities whose absence forms the chief virtue of Mr. Norman O'Neill's music to Maeterlinck's play 'The Blue Bird.' A composer with an individual style and artistic judgment, he has written music which enters into the fanciful and mystic spirit of the drama and helps to create an illusion and an 'atmosphere' in the theatre. Some of the best passages are contained in the set of four dances which are now issued arranged for pianoforte solo. The most effective in this guise is the dance of Fire and Water; the dances of the Mist-maids, the Stars and the Hours have many attractive points of melody and harmony that bear the stamp of originality.

Vagrant Songs. Poetry by Eleanor Farjeon. Music by Harry Farjeon (Op. 26). For baritone voice.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

In this volume Mr. Harry Farjeon makes no concealment of his admiration for the Debussian type of harmonies. 'Under the dark' and 'White Woman,' are clever studies in a mild application of the imported idiom which, however, never for a moment appears to be the composer's natural method of expression. Moreover, any pretence that it is so is immediately belied in the three remaining songs, which are thoroughly English in style—except here and there in 'Wander Hunger'—and undeniably the best of the collection. 'Of troubles I know none' is amusing, and happily expressed as regards both music and words; it has even a 'catchy' tune. 'I went far and cold' embodies some peculiarities of notation and an accidental reminder of a familiar theme by Tchaikovsky. All five of the songs possess interest and a distinctive character.

The Unison Chant Choir-Book. By Arthur W. Pollitt, D.Mus., and Ernest Bryson.

[Henry Frowde, Oxford University Press.]

To those who feel that the highest form of worship is obtained by congregational singing, the work before us will no doubt make a strong appeal. The vocal part of the chants is of low pitch, and generally of small compass and diatonic progression, and consequently easily grasped by the congregation. The accompaniments, though generally well designed, are, we think, rather full of notes, and might give trouble to some organists. There are also a few progressions which could not be satisfactorily explained, though the authors in their preface expressly regard the organ accompaniments in the light of suggestions, rather than as a strict adherence to academic rule. We should prefer a separate setting to the Psalms for the 31st Day, and presume chants for the Canticles will be provided in a new edition. The book is evidently the result of conscientious thought and high ideal.

Children's Singing Games. Edited by Alice B. Gomme and Cecil J. Sharp. (Books 198 and 199 of Novello's School Songs.)

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The pretty ring games that children used to play (and do yet, be it said) at one time were the sole property of the children themselves and the antiquaries who found in them references to remote customs dating from even Pagan times.

Mrs. Gomme has edited an authoritative work on such games for the Folk-Lore Society, and later made a selection from the two volumes of the Folk-Lore Society for sundry books of artistic character, wherein the little games have all the dignity that decorative art can lend. These books are now included among those that in second-hand booksellers' catalogues are marked 'scarce.'

The Board of Education having accepted the idea of singing games, Morris dancing, and country dancing as among the desirable things that should form part of elementary schooling, it has but remained for Mrs. Gomme and Mr. Cecil J. Sharp to combine forces and to produce the two works under notice.

There are twelve games in the two books, and these are all marked as 'collected and arranged' by Mr. Sharp.

Most country children, and many town ones, too, will be familiar with these, although collectors of these games will observe differences according to the district in which the tunes are obtained, for both games and airs have considerable variations in different parts of England.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE 'MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—It was a happy thought on the part of Dr. Alcock to draw attention to 'Three 17th Century Settings of the Litany.' It may interest those who read his appreciative article to know that the beautiful and plaintive setting by Thomas Wanless has been in use over forty years at St. Andrew's Church, Wells Street, where it is sung during the Lenten season.

Many years ago, a striking feature was the devotional rendering of the priest's part by the Rev. Benjamin Webb, the church's former well-known vicar.—Yours faithfully,

HENRY KNIGHT.

THE BICENTENARY OF DR. ARNE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE 'MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—On March 12 will be celebrated the Bicentenary of the birth of Dr. Thomas Arne, the greatest English composer of the 18th century, whose beautiful songs have stood the test of time, while his stirring setting to 'Rule, Britannia,' has done more than any other melody to create a patriotic spirit, and will last as long as the British Empire. Dr. Arne was born in King Street, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, on March 12, 1710. Most of his life was spent, and his work done, in this district; and he died in Bow Street, Covent Garden. He was baptized in St. Paul's Church, on May 28, 1710, and buried in the churchyard, on March 15, 1778. But there is no memorial to him in his Parish Church. We are anxious to remedy this serious defect, and to put up a tablet and coloured window to his memory in connection with the bicentenary of his birth. To all lovers of music and of their country this object will surely appeal. It has the heartiest sympathy and approval of Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Frederick Bridge, and other well-known men.

Subscriptions may be sent to the Treasurer of the 'Arne Memorial Fund,' R. Heming, Esq., Bank Manager, London County and Westminster Bank, Covent Garden, W.C., or through either of us. We are yours, &c.,

E. H. MOSSE (Rector),
H. E. WALL (Organist).

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths:—

MR. HANDEL THORLEY, at Heaton Chapel, Manchester, on January 20, at the age of eighty-seven. Mr. Thorley was for about thirty years a bass singer and Master of the Chorists in Manchester Cathedral, and was also for a long period choirmaster of the Bolton Choral Union. As an instrumentalist Mr. Thorley was one of the original members of the Hallé Orchestra, in which he played the double-bass for over forty years. A very beautiful wreath was contributed to his memory by the members of the Orchestra at the funeral.

DR. G. B. GARDINER, at Melrose, on January 19. While not a practical musician, he took the keenest interest in the collection of folk-songs, working principally in Hampshire, from which county he obtained a great number. A selection from these had only just been published by Messrs. Novello, and it is probable that he did not live long enough to see the work as it finally issued from the press.

MR. CHARLES MYLNE-BARKER, at Folkestone, on February 17, at the age of sixty-six. Mr. Barker was a member of the firm of Messrs. C. M. Barker & Co., solicitors, and was well known for his literary, dramatic and musical tastes. He had a great knowledge of music, and frequently sang in the Sunday evening choir at Westminster Abbey. He was also a member of the Moray Minstrels.

MR. HENRY BAKER, Mus. Bac., at Wimbledon, at the age of seventy-five. Mr. Baker was born at Nuneham and educated at Winchester School. He subsequently went to Coopers Hill to complete his education as a civil engineer. Always a lover of music, he proceeded to the degree of Mus. Bac. at Oxford, at the suggestion of the Rev. Dr. Dykes. He is best known as the composer of the hymn tune 'Hesperus,' and he also wrote several tunes for the Rev. Garrett Horder's 'Worship Song.'

THE VIOLA.

A paper on the subject of the Viola was read by Mr. Stanley Hawley on January 4 at the Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians held at Folkestone. The following is a precis of his remarks, the material for which was chiefly compiled by the Rev. H. Carte de Lafontaine.

The family of instruments to which the viola belongs have a common ancestor in the Eastern 'rebec,' which flourished in Europe during the late Middle Ages. The earliest recorded specimens of the violin are found to be really tinkered viols; the first genuine violins were made in the time of the Amatis at Cremona and the Maggini at Brescia. The tenor violin, really the oldest instrument in the quartet, was distinct from the alto violin—the true alto, which we call the tenor—and was first given the name 'viola' about the middle of the 17th century. Famous makers of the viola abounded in Italy; a few instruments were made by Stradivarius, of which ten are said to be extant. German makers gained a reputation in the latter portion of the 17th century, Jacob Stainer being the glory of the period. Belgium, the Low Countries, and France also supplied names to the list. In England the viol-fashion continued until the reign of Charles II. saw the introduction of the violin into Court music. Among English makers of violas William Forster and Joseph Hill deserve mention.

Composers early discovered the distinctive capabilities of the viola. Its employment by Gluck and Sacchini as a means of improving the dramatic orchestra preceded its full development under Mozart. The instrument afterwards gained particular favour with Berlioz. Moderns are awaking to the knowledge of the fair proportions of the viola-maiden, but they have not looked into her eyes, nor understood the beauty of her nature.

It is astonishing how small a quantity of chamber music which included a part for the viola was written before Boccherini and Haydn ensured permanency for the string quartet. The reason is probably that which caused an apparently entire cessation of viola making between 1700 and 1750. Haydn and later great composers indicated, by the nature of the solo passages that they allotted to the viola, how admirably they understood its quality. Mozart's Trio for pianoforte, clarinet and viola illustrates its general capacities. As a solo instrument the viola has suffered neglect. In many important musical institutions of Europe it is usually a violin professor who teaches the viola, a state of things that accords with the prevalent mistaken idea that a violinist has only to learn the alto clef to become a viola player.

Illustrations of viola playing were supplied by Mr. Lionel Tertis in the following programme:

Chaconne	Bach.
Romance for viola and orchestra (from Suite in D)	B. J. Dale.
A Fantasia Quartet for four violas	York Bowen.
Serenade	Guiraud.
Andante	A. d'Ambrósio.
Allegro	W. Wolstenholme.
Saltarello	Vieuxtemps.

In the quartet, Mr. Tertis was joined by Mr. J. T. Lockyer, Mr. Eric Coates and Mr. Raymond Jeremy. Dr. Alfred King was the chairman.

The forthcoming Keats-Shelley matinée has been arranged to take place at the Haymarket Theatre on June 10. The object of the matinée, which will consist almost entirely of dramatic and musical representations from the works of the two poets, is to complete the equipment of the Keats-Shelley Memorial House, which was opened at Rome, in April last, by the King of Italy.

MUSIC IN RELATION TO OTHER ARTS.

By H. WALFORD DAVIES.

On January 29 and February 5, Dr. Walford Davies completed his three lectures on the above subject at the Royal Institution. The following is the diagram of the artistic appeal to eye and ear used by the lecturer for the purposes of general and somewhat rough classification and correlation of the arts :

As already reported in our last issue, the lecturer attached great importance to the fact here indicated that there are two quite different elements in most of the arts, which he ventured to classify as those of expression and impression. That the first of these is found so strikingly in the arts of dancing, acting, music, poetry and oratory is due to the fact that man naturally expresses himself in infinite varieties of gesture and vocal utterance—i.e., of signs and sounds. The second and more absorbing element, that of deliberate design, is traceable to the natural love man happily possesses for order and the discernment of order, and to his progressive and ceaseless pursuit of orderliness in the things which he apprehends through eye and ear.

At the second lecture Dr. Davies discussed the relation and combination of music with its companion aural arts—poetry and oratory. He reminded the audience of the common origin of verbal and musical art, and of their habitual partnership in song. He dwelt upon the familiar difficulty experienced both in making and listening to two appeals simultaneously through the one channel, the ear. A common-sense view would seem to suggest that if two appeals are to be combined, one had better be to the eye, the other to the ear. The drawbacks of the verbal-musical compact were indeed no mere speculation of common sense, but matters of common experience. Probably the greatest music ever written was that which was free from all verbal fetters, e.g., Bach's 'Saints in Glory' Fugue, Mozart's G minor and 'Jupiter' Symphonies, Beethoven's C minor, Schubert's 'Unfinished,' Brahms's Clarinet quintet, &c. On the other hand, it is fairly obvious that certain poems are so absorbingly complete and perfect in their appeal that a musical setting would be a gross miscalculation. Dr. Beeching goes so far as to say that a fine sonnet should not even be spoken, but is at its best on the silent, written page. But though poet and musician can, and do, dispense with each other to advantage, there is yet a vast middle field where the close relations of musical and verbal utterance enable them wonderfully to enhance each other in combination. This middle ground formed the chief subject of the second lecture. Three divisions were noted in some detail: (1) that in which the words made the predominant appeal, as in plain recitative or chant; (2) that in which the music leads, as in the complex choral art of such movements as Bach's Sanctus or Kyrie in the B minor Mass; (3) that in which the two arts exist on more equal terms, as in such a perfectly balanced old song as 'It was a lover and his lass, where not only metre but actual rhymes are minutely preserved and reflected in the music. Dr. Davies pointed out that music had yet much to learn from poetry in this last and more equal relationship. It seems surprising how little the identities of method in each are used to attain an identical design, and it was, he said, one of the chief objects of these lectures to suggest that here is a fruitful field for artistic enterprise to-day. We have a rough idea of fitting tunes to words in rhythm and metre, though even distinguished composers violate the compact needlessly, often choosing a musical line of four feet for a poetic line of three. The square four-bar rhythm of music is painfully universal. The exquisite subtleties of poetic metre have yet to be matched in music. Where, for example, is the fine counterpart in music to the delicate metrical arrangement of Herrick's 'To daffodils'? The reflection of rhyme in melodic phrases and cadences—as in the old Shakespearean song already named—awaits cultivation in numberless attractive ways by future composers. It is, perhaps, a drawback that poetry is nearly always set to music. It might be a salutary change if (let it be supposed), for a decade, music were set to poetry. In the cases where this has been done—by Burns, for example—the results were certainly most felicitous.

There is a suggestive current half-truth which asserts that words convey thought and music conveys feeling. The utmost that can truly be said is that words are apt to convey thought and music is apt to convey feeling. Both words and music may convey and evoke both thought and feeling, but owing to their diverse aptitudes they tend to diverge, and it is their natural divergences that make their union permanently and notoriously difficult. It was pointed out that these divergences arise chiefly in the matter of design. Spontaneous verbal utterance and spontaneous melodic utterance may mutually illumine each other at the outset, while the attempt to reconcile poetic and musical designs of any magnitude may subsequently greatly hamper both arts. No one, the lecturer imagined, ever surpassed Handel in devising an initial phrase that reproduced the verbal impulse with perfect veracity, enhancing the emotion without confusing the sense. Examples were given, and the incompatibilities were shown to arise where verbal design was violated for the sake of musical design in development, as in 'For unto us' in the 'Messiah.' It was further pointed out that, in that very chorus, Handel's masterly reversion to a colossal declamatory design of equal verbal and musical veracity (at the words 'Wonderful, Counsellor,' &c.) by a stroke of genius saved the situation. Besides the problem of divergent design, it may be seen that there is a standing practical problem in the reconciliation of the sostenuto of music with clear-cut, short enunciation of graphic speech. Broadly speaking, the greatest asset of song is sustained sound. And it is an awkward fact that the device which is the glory of one art may, and often does, hopelessly caricature the other. A sostenuto natural and attractive in song may be grotesque and repellent from the point of view of well-proportioned speech; and it is to be observed that the same emotional situation may provoke on the one hand an intense musical sostenuto, and on the other a torrent of graphic words that will not bear sustaining. In concluding this lecture, Dr. Davies suggested that success and safety lay in the alternation of verbal and musical interest rather than in a rigid maintenance of a set relationship between the two. The great masters have often not hesitated to make music the predominant partner at one moment and words at another, not only in alternate movements but by the most rapid transitions in one and the same movement. The naive way in which Haydn uses musical interludes to suggest the various animals as they are created—the flexible tiger, the nimble stag, the sinuous worm, &c.—affords child-like illustrations of a great principle. No one used it with more wonderful effect than Bach in his devotional works. An instance was sung by the choir, in which elaborate contrapuntal texture suddenly gives place to dry recitative with no loss of unity. 'Have we not,' the lecturer said, 'lately rather fallen between two stools? We scorn recitativo 'secco on the one hand, and the great Temples of choral art are not built any longer. We move vaguely in the mid-ground, and our large modern choral works are usually long efforts of faithful musical illustration of words, mostly declamation. We dare not pause to build, and we dare not simply write a thin line of monotone should the verbal sense need it. Surely we must, with all our added heritage, yet revert in the near future wherever words demand it to a simpler declamation that shall not weary nor exhaust musical susceptibility, but on the contrary refresh and prepare the hearer for the great musical periods; and we must clearly not spurn, but only seek a grander abstract art—of which the words, if any, shall be wisely chosen key-words, that bear repetition and expansion.'

We ought, he believed, to realise more fully that this alternation of interests is true to life and to every-day experience. New thought leads to new intensity of feeling and purpose. This gives rise to strong emotional utterance, which in its turn prepares the way for a further mental effort; and so on to ever higher planes of musical and verbal achievement. It is only needed that in one and the same work neither of the two materials in which it is wrought should be strained to breaking point.

Midway between the extremes of unadorned recitative (in which words lead) and mighty structures of sound (in which music leads) are the possibilities of innumerable varieties of combination in which music and poetry may more happily conform with each other, conspiring to carry out one beautiful design. In the present-day union of words to music, the over-elaboration of thought which sometimes mars even Bach's work is no less to be avoided than the over-elaboration of emotion which clearly mars Wagner's and that of other more recent composers. We need an unflinching veracity of both musical and poetic import, and a sane intensity in the blend of verbal and musical as of intellectual and emotional utterance which shall convince and refresh the hearer.

The report of the concluding lecture will be given in our April number.

BRIGHTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The second Musical Festival arranged by the Municipality of Brighton took place on February 2, 3, 4, and 5, in the Dome. Though intended in the first place simply as an attraction to the well-known watering place at which Municipal music has been a feature for some time past, the festival has assumed a high degree of artistic worth. Upon this fact, Mr. Joseph Sinton, the Musical Director to the Corporation and conductor in chief of the festival, is to be congratulated. It would have been an easy matter for him to have rested content with supplying the band performances his contract demanded, but his earnestness and energy could not rest content with a mere perfunctory performance of his duties, and he very soon set to work to make his position one of considerable artistic influence. First, certain of the programmes of the ordinary performances of the Municipal Orchestra were given up to British music. The result was most gratifying, and as a consequence a festival followed last year and was a decided success. It was continued this year with sundry developments that entirely met the approval of the patrons of the undertaking. The most important innovation was the formation of a festival choir. A body of four hundred singers was recruited from the neighbourhood by Mr. Sinton, and trained with such results as to win for the festival the distinction of being the means of showing that there is as good choral material in the South as in the North. The singing of the choir was a complete revelation. In other respects the festival was memorable. The attendance was excellent, and the audience showed the unusual feature of an ability to take an intelligent interest in brand-new works, of which there were several examples in the scheme.

Opera had a very large place in the programme and was, moreover, received with marked approval. The festival began with a concert performance of M. Saint-Saëns's Biblical opera 'Samson and Delilah.' The Delilah was Madame Marie Brema, who sang with dramatic force, though not always with warmth. Mr. Walter Hyde made a good deal of the music of Samson, and Mr. Robert Burnett as the High Priest, Mr. Robert Charlesworth as the Aged Hebrew, and Messrs. George Baker, S. Hempall, Byndon-Ayres and D. Paine in the other characters, helped in giving a good all-round interpretation. The choir sang with resonant volume of tone, excellent balance, and remarkable intelligence. The Municipal Orchestra, augmented to seventy, gave a good but occasionally demonstrative account of the score. The programme of the second concert consisted of the second act of Wagner's 'The Flying Dutchman.' A notable feature was the singing of Mr. Thorpe Bates as the Dutchman, and of Mr. John Coates as Eric. Miss Edith Evans was the Senta, and Mr. Robert Burnett the Daland. The audience was clearly interested, but its enjoyment of the performance would have been greater had the programme given some description of the situation. The Spinning Chorus was sung with delightful freshness of tone by the sopranos and contraltos of the choir.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's new work, 'Endymion's Dream,' followed. The cantata, which is short, is based on the classic legend of the association of Endymion—the name given to the sun as it descends into the sea—and Selene, the goddess of the moon. Endymion, granted everlasting life, was conveyed to Mount Latmos, and Selene gazed upon him nightly in her passage across the heavens. Mr. C. R. B. Barrett, the librettist, has made the myth a subject for musical treatment by chorus and two soloists: Endymion (tenor), and Selene (soprano). In his setting of the story of the meeting of Endymion with Selene, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor once more shows his ability to write attractively for the chorus. This fact, as well as the generally pleasing character of the work, will win ready acceptance for it at the hands of choral societies. The solo portions are much in the style of opera, and the whole composition is fresh in character, conveyed with considerable resource and inventiveness. Among the solo portions, the number for Selene 'Nightly for ages' may be noted for its excellent climax, and the composer is equally happy in his design of the tenor numbers. The work develops into a duet of considerable animation, and with the grateful sections for the chorus the whole provides a subject likely to prove of interest to all classes of audiences. The composer conducted an excellent performance. The soloists were Miss Edith Evans and Mr. John Coates. A thoroughly well-prepared reading of Verdi's 'Requiem' was a feature of the third concert. Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Lilian Tree, Mr. John Coates and Mr. Watkin Mills provided the solo quartet, and Mr. Joseph Sinton conducted. The programme contained a new work in the shape of a set of 'Songs of the open air,' composed for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra, by Mr. James R. Dear, who conducted. Mr. Plunket Greene was the soloist, and the songs, which are tuneful and grateful if not strikingly original, were received with approval. Sir Charles Stanford's musical joke 'Ode to discord' was also exploited under his direction. On the last day there were two concerts. In the afternoon M. Paderewsky's Symphony was given in Brighton for the first time, and Dr. Christian Sinding's orchestral 'Rondo Infinito' and some of his songs were conducted by himself.

A new orchestral work entitled 'Life's Moods,' by Mr. Arthur Hervey, was performed for the first time, and proved a well-devised series of tone-pictures of various phases of feeling. The composer conducted. The programme also included an Orchestral suite by Dr. W. H. Speer, entitled 'Cinderella,' and Mr. Edward German's 'Spring,' both directed by their composers. Songs were also given by Miss Jean Waterston and Mr. Plunket Greene. The evening programme included a concert-performance of Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' which aroused much enthusiasm, with Miss Esta D'Argo, Miss Lilian Tree, Miss Enid Gabell, Mr. Walter Hyde and Mr. Robert Burnett as the exponents of the characters. Dr. Sinding conducted his own scholarly Symphony in D minor, Miss Marie Novello played the solo part in Liszt's Pianoforte concerto in E flat, and the festival came to an end with a Symphonic March by Mr. Rutland Boughton. The attendance was good, and the level of the performances excellent. A pleasant feature of the event was found in the special services held at the Parish Church each afternoon. An anthem was given each day by a full choir under the direction of Mr. Chastey Hector, the organist and choirmaster of the church.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

British music was well represented at the concert given at Queen's Hall on January 27. The programme opened with a set of orchestral variations on 'Old King Cole,' written by Mr. Nicholas Gatty when a Royal College student, and revised for this occasion. Their genial character carried out that of the subject, and their diatonic idiom and delicate texture were welcome features. Mr. Norman O'Neill's setting for baritone and orchestra of Keats's 'La belle dame sans merci' was rightly music of a different class, for it adequately expressed in musical terms the mystery of the poem. The baritone part was well sung by Mr. Ernest Austin. The refinement of the two British compositions was a contrast to the coarseness that disfigures parts of Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony. The soloist of the occasion was M. Tivadar Nachez, who played his own second Violin concerto. Mr. Landon Ronald conducted all but Mr. O'Neill's work, which was performed under the composer's direction.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Much interest was aroused by the concert given on January 31, when Elgar's Symphony was the chief work in the programme and M. Safonoff the conductor. His reading was, as one would expect, largely governed by a desire for orchestral effects of a brilliant nature, and was strongly coloured by romantic feeling. It made extraordinary demands upon the virtuosity of the players; demands which their close acquaintance with the score enabled them to meet with certainty. In the last movement the effect was exhilarating. The remainder of the programme consisted of Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung,' a Concerto Grosso for strings, by Handel, and an excerpt from 'Parsifal.'

Beethoven's great Mass in D and Dr. Coward's Sheffield Musical Union formed a dual attraction that brought an immense audience to Queen's Hall on February 14. The extraordinary demands made by the Mass on choral singers are such that only a body of the calibre of Dr. Coward's forces can deal with them successfully. On this occasion the executive feats of the choir were a triumph. Their delivery of such choruses as the 'Et vitam venturi' was a thing to be remembered. Under Dr. Richter's direction they gave a dignified reading of the Mass, vitalised by the dramatic instinct they have acquired from Dr. Coward's training. They were heard unaccompanied in a brilliant performance—sometimes square as regards rhythm—of Bach's Motet for double-chorus, 'Sing ye to the Lord,' and an expressive interpretation of Elgar's six-part piece 'Go, song of mine.' They traversed the harmonic difficulties of the part-song with firm decision and treated the more placid sections sympathetically, but without fully plumbing their depths. Both of the smaller works were conducted by Dr. Coward. The orchestra opened the concert with Mozart's Symphony in B flat (K. 319). The soloists in the Mass were Miss Gleeson-White, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Robert Radford.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

At the concert given on January 29, the most important work brought forward was César Franck's Symphony in D minor. This noble and impressive composition was admirably played, but it was not plain why in some places the pace was much altered. Miss Marie Hall played, and Mr. George Henschel sang.

On February 12, the Franck Symphony was repeated by request, and the high artistic value of the work was again made clear. Herr Emil Sauer delighted the audience by his fine playing of the 'Emperor' Pianoforte concerto (Beethoven), and the G minor concerto of Mendelssohn. A new Romance for strings by Sibelius was a fair success. Mr. Henry J. Wood conducted on both occasions, and displayed his customary mastery of his resources.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

At the fourth concert of the season, given on February 10, at Queen's Hall, a very long programme included a performance of Sir Hubert Parry's revised version of his fourth Symphony in E minor, which to many present was the most interesting item. William Wallace's fine symphonic poem 'Villon' opened the concert, and Mr. Landon Ronald's dramatic scena for baritone solo and orchestra, 'The lament of Shah Jehan,' was sung with much effective declamation by Mr. Edmund Burke. Herr Emil Sauer achieved his usual success in Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A minor and some solos, including Liszt's 'Venezia e Napoli.'

Parry's Symphony is, as revised, a large and important work. It has a sort of moral programme as a basis. The first movement is headed 'Looking for it,' the second movement (an Adagio) has 'Thinking about it' as its motto, the Scherzo illustrates 'Playing on it,' and the brisk Finale 'Girt for it.' There is much to admire in the work. It displays considerable strength and vivacity, and the slow movement has much beauty. It may be hoped that the whole symphony may soon be heard again before an audience not previously tired out.

MR. JOSEPH HOLBROOKE'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

This event occasioned considerable interest in musical circles, although it did not draw a crowded audience. It took place at the Queen's Hall, on February 11, with the assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra, specially augmented for the occasion. It included saxophones, flugel horns, saxhorns, oboe d'amore and a cornò di bassetto. The programme consisted entirely of Mr. Holbrooke's works. The most notable items were the poem 'Uralume' and the Prelude and Scena for bass solo from 'Dylan,' a music-drama in three acts, written by Mr. T. E. Ellis, and set to music by Mr. Holbrooke. Both works displayed the composer at his best. They are full of ingenious devices and have remarkable colour. It is not easy to accustom one's ears to some of Mr. Holbrooke's climaxes, which at times are overpowering. There is, however, enough otherwise to earn admiration for real beauty of effect. The concert will, on the whole, increase Mr. Holbrooke's reputation and excite curiosity as to his future development.

Mr. Landon Ronald shared the conducting with Mr. Holbrooke, and Mr. Robert Radford was the vocalist.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

With even more than its customary enterprise, this now apparently firmly established Society ventured to give at the Queen's Hall on February 15 the whole three parts of Granville Bantock's 'Omar Khayyam.' The performance began at 7.30 p.m. and continued with only fifteen minutes' break until 11 p.m. It says much for the power, variety of colour and range of expression of this fine exemplification of the genius of the composer that the work held the attention throughout. In fact, the third part was in many respects the most absorbingly interesting. Further criticism of the work itself is impossible here. It must suffice to record the high merit of the performance, which bore witness to the ability of Mr. Arthur Fagge, who conducted, and to the assiduity with which the difficult music had been rehearsed. The soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Frederic Austin, the latter of whom very particularly distinguished himself. The London Symphony Orchestra assisted.

GLUCK'S 'IPHIGENIA IN TAURIS.'

Although Gluck is honoured as a composer who has set his mark upon the history of opera, the honour seldom takes tangible form in a performance of his works. 'Iphigenia in Tauris,' one of his most representative operas, has suffered undue neglect, and therefore its revival fitted the policy of the Royal College of Music. The postponed production of the work by this institution took place at His Majesty's Theatre on February 18, and met with a well-deserved success. The chief responsibility fell upon the shoulders of Miss Viola Tree (Exhibitioner), as Iphigenia, and Mr. Jamieson Dodds as Orestes, and it was due to their ability that justice was done to the dignity of Gluck's music. Miss Tree's voice revealed an improvement in quality and her acting showed the benefit of experience. Efficient work was done by Mr. Ivor Walters (Scholar), as Pylades, and Mr. George Baker (Scholar) as Thoas. Other parts were taken by Misses Dorothy Webb, Katherine Vincent, Florence Barrow, Agnes Christa and Erica Pierpoint, and Messrs. John Roxburgh and Eric Roper. A grotesque war-dance of armed Scythians and the pleasant-toned singing of the Priestesses were the most noteworthy features of the chorus work. An orchestra almost entirely composed of past and present pupils of the College gave a well-studied reading of the score. Sir Charles Stanford conducted, and Mr. Richard Temple was the stage director.

OPERATIC NOTES.

New operas continue to flow from the pens which created the familiar combination of 'I Pagliacci' and 'Cavalleria Rusticana.' Leoncavallo's 'Maia' was produced, with equivocal success, in Rome on January 15. Mascagni is under contract to prepare a new work, 'Ysobel,' founded on Tennyson's 'Godiva,' for production in the United States before the end of the year.

It is stated by the Westminster Gazette that Mr. C. H. Workman has in hand arrangements for the production of another new musical piece at the Savoy early next month. This will be a work entitled 'Two Merry Monarchs.' The libretto will be by Arthur Anderson and George Levy, the lyrics by Arthur Anderson and Hartley Garrick, and Mr. Orlando Morgan will be the composer.

Mr. Frank Rendle has signed a contract with Mr. Thomas Beecham for a further season of thirteen weeks at Covent Garden, beginning on October 1, 1910, under the management of Mr. Thomas Quinlan. Mr. Beecham promises to produce for the first time in England several operas, particulars of which will be duly announced. The following artists have already been engaged: Madame Agnes Nicholls, Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Edith Evans, Miss Caroline Hatchard, Madame Edna Thornton, Madame Zélie Lussan, Mr. Walter Hyde, Mr. John Coates, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, Mr. Alfred Heather, Mr. Byndon-Ayres, Mr. Robert Maitland, Mr. Frederic Austin, Mr. Albert Archdeacon, Mr. Charles Knowles, Mr. Robert Radford, and Mr. Alfred Kaufmann. The operas will be given in English.

It is proposed to form a new opera society with the object of presenting (a) original English opera; (b) foreign operas of distinction; (c) opera, refused a licence by the Censor, which, in the judgment of the committee, should not have been prohibited on the English stage. Mr. Frederick Whelen is largely concerned in the project. A preliminary meeting was held at the residence of Lord Howard de Walden. Strauss's 'Salome' was suggested as the first work to be given.

Mr. Thomas Beecham has signed a contract with Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree for a season of light opera, to take place at His Majesty's Theatre, commencing May 8, 1910, for a period of eleven weeks, under the management of Mr. Thomas Quinlan. During the season five or six novelties will be produced, and the following list of operas is under consideration for performance:

Shamus O'Brien.	La Basoche.
Hänsel and Gretel.	Werther.
Manon.	Tales of Hoffmann.
Mignon.	Muguette.
Le Chemineau.	Solanges.
Figaro.	Carmen.
Cendrillon.	Der Fledermaus.

A brochure containing programme, list of artists, synopsis of operas and dates of performances will be issued shortly, and will be obtainable from Mr. Thomas Quinlan, 318, Regent Street, W. Several well-known artists have already been engaged, and the operas will be sung in English.

THE LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL CHOIR.

A vast audience attended the Annual Festival Concert given by the London Sunday School Choir at the Albert Hall, on February 19, and displayed throughout a lively interest in the proceedings. The share taken by the choir in a well-chosen programme consisted of four anthems—'O worship the King' (Mauder), 'Prepare ye the way' (Garrett), 'Thou wilt keep him' (Lee Williams), and 'Jerusalem the golden' (R. G. Thompson); three choruses—the March to Calvary from Gounod's 'Redemption,' 'O great is the depth,' from Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' and 'Come if you dare,' from Purcell's 'King Arthur'; and three part-songs—'The river floweth' (Roland Rogers), 'Song of the pedlar' (Lee Williams), and 'The shepherd's farewell' (Smart). Although the choir of 1,200 singers was collected from various sources especially for the occasion, its efficiency in some respects compared well with that of the permanent organizations. The tone in each section was pure and well-knit, and the attack was never behind the conductor's beat, the tendency being rather to anticipate it now and then. In spite of its great size, the choir was a plastic body, and achieved some effects of expression very creditably under the able guidance of Mr. William Whiteman. Everything that could do so indicated efficient sectional training. The orchestra, consisting of amateur instrumentalists with a leavening of professionals, played its part in the work of accompanying, and contributed independent items under the guidance of Mr. Wesley Hammet, all of which proved popular. They included a selection of Mendelssohn's 'Songs without words' and Schubert's overture 'Rosamunde.' Miss Agnes Nicholls sang Costa's 'I will extol Thee,' accompanied by Mr. Hamilton Harty, and Mr. Charles Saunders sang 'I will arise,' from Sullivan's 'The Prodigal Son,' accompanied by Mrs. Mary Layton. The demands made for encores were frequent and successful.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

This institution makes public performances a strong feature of its work. On February 8, the College choir performed Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' under Dr. H. T. Pringuer. Mr. Harry A. Gray was at the organ, and Mrs. James R. Blazey was at the pianoforte.

The principles of organ-playing taught at this institution were illustrated and driven home by actual example on February 18, when a recital was given at the College by one of the recognised masters of the art, Mr. Edwin H. Lemare. His clean execution and breadth of general effect were notable in the performance of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, and Mendelssohn's scholarly sixth Sonata. The educative usefulness of the occasion was increased by the insertion in the programme of an analysis of the latter work. Mr. Lemare's gifts as a composer were exemplified in a new 'Rondo Capriccio,' a study on one note (in the bass) entitled 'Soutenir,' and the Scherzo from his Organ Symphony, Op. 50. Written for the most part in a light vein, these works never lost their appropriate character, or failed to be interesting. Mr. Lemare displayed his skill in an important branch of an organist's equipment when he improvised upon a theme handed to him during the recital. The audience showed full appreciation at every stage.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

On Ash Wednesday, February 9, this Society, as usual, performed the 'Dream of Gerontius,' under Sir Frederick Bridge. They have now given many performances of the work, and show increasing confidence in executing the difficult choruses as they get on familiar terms with the music. Their singing of the Demon music suffered from the inherent disabilities of a mammoth choir in dealing with intricate vocal parts, but their reading of the oratorio as a whole was both expressive and impressive. The soloists were Madame Edna Thornton (Angel), Mr. Gervase Elwes (Gerontius), and Mr. William Higley (Priest and Angel of the Agony), who sang with all their distinguished ability. Mr. H. L. Balfour was the organist.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The Stock Exchange Choral and Orchestral Society gave a concert at Queen's Hall on February 2. The chief work given was Mr. Frederic Cliffe's Symphony in C minor (Op. 1), which was first performed at the Crystal Palace in 1889. Naturally it did not impress with its modernity, but rather it displayed the features, probably more acceptable to the audience, of lucidity and pleasant melody. The composer conducted a sympathetic and careful performance. Mr. Allen Gill conducted the remainder of the orchestral programme, which included Beethoven's 'Egmont' overture. Miss Enid Gabell sang Brahms's 'Rhapsody' for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, assisted by the choir, under the direction of Mr. Munro Davison. Some unaccompanied part-songs were also effectively sung.

The concert given by the Strolling Players' Orchestra, under Mr. Joseph Ivimey's direction, at Queen's Hall, on February 3, brought to a hearing Dvůřák's Symphony No. 3, a work that suffers undue neglect. The task of the amateur instrumentalists was lightened with judicious 'cutting,' and the compressed version was played with spirit and in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. The string band was heard in Grieg's Suite 'Aus Holberg's Zeit,' and the complete orchestra accompanied Madame Lily Henkel in Hiller's Pianoforte concerto in F sharp minor. Songs were contributed by Madame Chrysé Davida and Mr. Roland Jackson.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

On January 26 the New String Quartet, composed of Messrs. A. E. Sammons, T. W. Petre, H. Waldo Warner, and C. Warwick Evans—four exceedingly able performers individually—gave their first concert at Bechstein Hall. Their programme consisted of Quartets by Dohnányi and Tchaikovsky, and Mr. Waldo Warner's 'Phantasie Quartet' in F.

At the chamber concert given by pupils of the Royal College of Music on January 27, Brahms's String quintet in G was the chief work performed.—The Wessely Quartet included Sir Charles Stanford's Quintet in C minor (Op. 86), in their concert at Bechstein Hall on February 2.—The Motto Quartet played familiar works in excellent style at Æolian Hall on February 15; the value of the occasion was further increased by the presence of Miss Muriel Foster (Mrs. Goetz) as vocalist.

A Pianoforte trio in F minor, by M. Volkmar Andreae, produced by the London Trio in 1907, was repeated by them at their concert in Æolian Hall on February 1. Containing no striking features, it nevertheless proved an interesting work and one possessed of a certain merit. At this concert Mr. Whitehouse, the violoncellist of the Trio, undertook, in his turn, the functions of a soloist. Songs were given by Madame Helen Noldi.

At a concert of the excellent Langley-Mukle series, given at 19, Grosvenor Square, on February 1, two Phantasie-Trios were played by Miss Beatrice Langley (violin), Miss May Mukle (violinello), and Mr. York Bowen (pianoforte). One was by Mr. Bowen, and the other the Trio by Mr. John Ireland that gained a prize in the 'Cobbett' competition.

The programme of the concert given by the London Chamber Concert Association in Novello's Music Room, on February 2, deserves to be put on record for its unconventional character. It was as follows:

Serenade in D, Op. 77a, for flute, violin and viola	M. Reger.
Entr'acte in D minor (MS.), for oboe, clarinet, horn and violoncello	E. W. Naylor.
Variations in G (MS.), for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and pianoforte	"
Phantasie in E minor, for pianoforte, violin and violoncello	J. Friskin.
Suite in G minor, Op. 57, for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon	C. H. Lefebvre.

The performance was excellent. We regret that we have no space for detailed criticism.

The Russian Trio, consisting of Messrs. Michael and Joseph Press, and Madame Vera Maurin-Press, made a highly successful début at the Steinway Hall, on Monday afternoon, February 7. The performances of these artists, who are evidently individually excellent as soloists, were always distinguished by a rare perfection of ensemble and unanimity of conception, which enabled them fully to reveal the many beauties contained in Schubert's Trio in B flat, and Tchaikovsky's in A minor (Op. 50).

Those enthusiasts in the cause of neglected old music, Miss Grace Sunderland and Mr. Frank Thistleton, announce a sixth series of recitals, the programmes of which are to be drawn from that fertile source. The series is to comprise three concerts, of which the first took place at Steinway Hall on February 16. The chief work performed was a Concerto by John Hebben, written for two oboes, strings and harpsichord (represented by the pianoforte). The concert-givers performed a Violin and Pianoforte sonata by Veracini, and music by Handel and Purcell completed the instrumental programme. Mr. Roland Jackson contributed songs.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

That clever composer and pianist, Mr. York Bowen, gave a recital in both capacities at Æolian Hall on January 29. The two chief works on the programme were of his own making: the one was a new Suite for violin and pianoforte, given with M. Zacharewitsch as violinist, and the other a second Suite for pianoforte alone. Mr. Bowen played throughout with unflinching technical brilliance.

A well-chosen programme was carried out with success by Miss Kathleen Bruckshaw at Æolian Hall, on February 7. The 'Keltic' Sonata of Macdowell, Beethoven's 'Appassionata,' and pieces by Reger, Saint-Saëns, Brahms, and Chopin were played with distinction. Miss Bruckshaw also submitted two pleasant examples of her own composition—a 'Romance,' and a Suite entitled 'Moods.'

M. Benno Moisewitch, a young pianist, made his début at Bechstein Hall on Tuesday afternoon, February 8, and gave evidence of a vivid temperament and considerable technical powers in Beethoven's 'Sonata appassionata' (Op. 57) and Schumann's 'Carnival.'

On the same evening Mr. Richard Buhlig gave the first of three recitals in the Æolian Hall. The programme, which was entirely devoted to Beethoven, contained the rarely-heard Sonata in D (Op. 10, No. 3), the thirty-two Variations in C minor, and the last two Sonatas (Op. 110 and Op. 111). At his second recital, on February 15, Mr. Buhlig gave a fine performance of Schubert's Sonata in G major (Op. 78). He also showed his artistic powers to much advantage in Brahms's early Sonata in F sharp minor (Op. 2), and the same master's Pianoforte pieces (Op. 119).

Before a large and enthusiastic audience, Herr Emil Sauer gave his only recital at Queen's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, February 9. He again, as often before, charmed his hearers with his beautiful touch and immaculate technique. He reached a very high level in Brahms's Scherzo in E flat minor (Op. 4), and in modern French pieces by Gabriel Fauré, Debussy and Saint-Saëns. The latter's Toccata (Op. 112), after the Finale of the fifth Pianoforte concerto, was rendered with wonderful bravura and virtuosity.

Apart from the excellent qualities of Mrs. Davan Wetton's playing, exceptional interest was imparted to her recital at Bechstein Hall, on February 15, by the inclusion in the programme of John Field's Pianoforte concerto in A flat. The interest of the unfamiliar was fully sustained by the rest of the music, in which Hans von Bronsart and Sterndale Bennett were represented. The concert was given with the assistance of the London Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Payne.

M. Alfred Cortot roused great enthusiasm with his playing at Æolian Hall, on February 16. His programme included Liszt's B minor Sonata, Franck's 'Prelude, Aria, and Finale,' and a 'Theme and Variations' by Camille Chevillard.

OTHER RECITALS.

Two matinée recitals have been given at Æolian Hall, under the management of Messrs. Chappell, in furtherance of their scheme for bringing little-known English artists before the public. Both Miss Clara Butterworth and Miss Marjorie Hayward, who appeared on January 27, were fully worthy of a hearing, but it cannot be said that they stood in great need of it. The rich vocal quality and expressiveness of Miss Butterworth's singing and the purity and sympathy of Miss Hayward's violin playing had already received recognition. At the second matinée, which took place on February 10, the programme was provided by Miss Alice Baxter (vocalist) and Mr. Cecil Baumer (pianist), and was carried out with success.

Madame Nina Menzies raised her recital at Queen's Hall, on February 1, above the ordinary level of interest by securing the assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald. Three songs from Alexandre Georges' 'Marka' were the chief unfamiliar items in the programme, which included two of Wagner's fugitive vocal pieces and a Puccini excerpt. The orchestra played Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, and Mr. J. D. Davis's tone-poem, 'The Maid of Astolat.'

At the concert given by Miss Ethel Barns (violin) and Mr. Charles Phillips (vocalist) at Bechstein Hall on the same date, a Violin and Pianoforte sonata in G by Guillaume Lekeu supplied the chief interest. Miss May Elliot was the pianist. Mr. Phillips's contributions included the four 'Serious songs' of Brahms.

Evidence of the steady progress made by Master Eddy Brown in the art of violin playing was given at his recital at Queen's Hall on February 2. He dealt decisively with Paganini's Concerto (Op. 6), without, however, completely subduing all the unruly portions, with Saint-Saëns's 'Havanaise,' and with a Handel Sonata. Mr. Charlton Keith played accompaniments, and Miss Ada Forrest contributed songs.

Mr. Robert Charlesworth sang songs of different styles in four languages at his recital at Bechstein Hall, on February 3, and on the whole justified himself in making these demands on his versatility. His voice is a bass of pleasant and powerful tone. A song-cycle, 'Elliland,' by Alex. von Fielitz, formed part of his programme.

A joint recital was given at Æolian Hall, on February 4, by Miss Myrtle Meggy (pianoforte) and Mr. Horace Fellowes (violin). Miss Meggy showed a leaning towards Mendelssohn in the choice of solos. Mr. Fellowes played two movements from a Concerto by Mr. J. C. Ames, accompanied by Mr. Stanley Hawley. —Mr. Johan Rasch (violinist) and Mr. Lloyd Hartley (pianoforte), gave a recital at Steinway Hall on February 7; their programme consisted of Sonatas by Schumann, Beethoven and César Franck.

On the same day six organ students of the Royal Academy of Music—Miss E. M. Fulton, Miss M. Detmar, Mr. A. Rowley, Mr. E. H. Hollingham, Mr. H. Perry and Mr. S. Duncan—gave an interesting recital at the Academy.

On Saturday, February 5, Mr. Felix Salmond gave his second Violoncello recital at Bechstein Hall. He is a young and very talented artist, who, in Boëllmann's Variations Symphoniques and the Andante from Dvorák's Concerto in B minor, showed himself to be the possessor of a beautiful tone and advanced technique. With the valuable assistance of his mother, Mrs. Norman Salmond, at the pianoforte, he gave in addition a musically excellent performance of César Franck's beautiful Violoncello sonata in A major (as arranged for violoncello by the composer).

Two recitals have been given by Miss Elena Gerhardt, whose appearances are becoming a familiar and always welcome feature in the London concert season. As usual she chose to build up her programmes with familiar material, and her interpretations of German Lieder compelled admiration for their artistic completeness. The recitals took place at Bechstein Hall on February 10, and Queen's Hall on February 16, and on both occasions Miss Paula Hegner accompanied.

Miss Dorothy Dorning (violinist) and Miss Marjorie Dorning (pianist) made a successful first appearance at Æolian Hall on February 17.

Suburban Concerts.

On January 29 the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society gave Elgar's 'The Apostles,' under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill. The soloists were Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Webster Millar, Mr. Thorpe Bates, Mr. Charles Knowles, and Mr. Julien Henry. A large audience showed every appreciation of a notable performance.

The St. Peter's Choral Society, Brockley, gave an excellent performance of 'Hiawatha,' Parts 1 and 2, with selections from Part 3, on February 1, under the direction of Dr. C. J. Frost. The solo vocalists were Miss Jessie Hudson, a young and promising singer, Mr. William Maxwell and Mr. Dan Price. A small orchestra of professional strings, under the direction of Mr. George Wilby, did efficient service, and Mr. John Curran accompanied.

The St. Martin's Choral Society, Gospel Oak, performed Smart's 'Bride of Dunkerron' at St. Martin's Parish Hall, on February 3, when the choir gave evidence of careful training under their conductor, Mr. G. A. Hardesty. The solo vocalists were Miss Winifred Marwood, Mr. Ben Calvert and Mr. Charles Roff. The programme also included Elgar's choral song 'On the Ahn,' from the 'Bavarian Highlands,' Miss F. H. Puzey's part-song 'When the pearly dews are sleeping,' Faning's 'Song of the Vikings,' and the orchestra played German's 'Henry VIII.' Dances.

A concert of sacred music was given on February 15, by the Emmanuel (Lambeth) Choral Society. The choir, under the direction of Mr. R. C. Law, organist and choirmaster of Emmanuel Church, rendered creditably part-songs and choruses, and the concert concluded with Mendelssohn's 'As the hart pants' (2nd Psalm). The performance reflected much credit on the training of the choir and soloists by the conductor.

MUSIC IN CANADA.

The annual cycle of concerts given by the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, which came to an end in the last week of January, met with the usual practical appreciation at the hands of the musical public, the large hall, seating 3,200, being filled to overflowing at every evening's performance. The audiences numbered many visitors from cities across the international boundary line, including music-lovers from New York, Detroit, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Buffalo, Chicago and other points. The splendid Theodore Thomas Orchestra, of Chicago, had been engaged at practically its full strength, the soloists for the series being Busoni (pianist), Mrs. Rider-Kelsey and Mrs. Sharp Herdien (sopranos), Mr. George Hanlin (tenor), and Messrs. Claude Cunningham and Marion Green (baritones).

The choral selections were Brahms's 'Requiem,' Piérné's 'The Children's Crusade,' César Franck's Psalm 150, 'Scenes from the Bavarian Highlands,' Elgar, excerpts from the same composer's 'Caractacus,' Grieg's 'Landerkenning,' and a cappella compositions by Tchaikovsky, Lassen, Granville Bantock, Grieg, Brahms, Kremer, and other composers.

The Choir gave a concert at Buffalo, N.Y., on the 14th inst., and two concerts at Cleveland, Ohio, on the evenings of the 15th and 16th inst., assisted by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, and by Messrs. Claude Cunningham and Herbert Witherspoon, soloists. At these concerts, selections from the Toronto repertoire for this season were given, besides shorter works by Gounod, Brockway, Vogt, Elgar, and others.

It is stated that at an auction at Florence the municipality of Genoa paid £32 for the bow of Paganini. It will be preserved with the Guarnerius violin which Paganini bequeathed, as his favourite instrument, to his native town.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, February 15, 1910.

Puccini's nerve-racking opera 'Tosca' has now been added to the repertoire of the Imperial Court Opera Theatre. The three leading parts (Tosca, Caravadossi and Scarpia) were sung by Fraulein Marcel and Messrs. Schmides and Demuth. Director v. Weingartner, who conducted, presented the work excellently. A new and effective mise en scène had also been provided. It is, however, questionable if our public will get used to the horrors of the libretto, and it will probably depend on this whether the opera becomes a permanent addition to the repertoire. A recent revival of Auber's 'Fra Diavolo' has again caused the wish that one might be able, in this and similar light operas, to hear the soloists and orchestra of the Court Opera in a smaller place, as the musical details and the spoken dialogue are often partly lost owing to the enormous dimensions of the Opera House. At the Volksoper, Director Simons had considerable success with the revival of the almost forgotten opera 'La Gioconda,' by Ponchielli. In the title-part, Fraulein Wenger gave evidence of great dramatic powers, the ensembles had been excellently studied, and the mounting of the work was both picturesque and brilliant. Two orchestral novelties, an Overture by Scheinpfug and a Symphony by Sibelius, aroused interest at the Philharmonic Concerts, another feature of which was the second appearance this season of Herr Moriz Rosenthal. On the occasion of the tenth anniversary of its foundation the Konzertverein gave a festival concert at which the conductor, Herr Ferdinand Löwe, was the recipient of many honours. Recitals, which during Carnival time were not frequent, are now given in abundance. Few artists have been able to arouse sufficient interest to fill the great hall of the Musikverein, but among the more successful were Fraulein Marcel, from the Imperial Opera, the much-fêted pianist, Alfred Grünfeld, and that wonderful violinist, Eugène Ysaÿe, whose concert this year, as always, formed the climax of the season.

RICHARD VON PERGER.

Music in the Provinces.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST.

One of our most flourishing young Societies, the Clarence Place Choral Union, gave an interesting concert on January 27, at which, in addition to a miscellaneous selection, Somervell's 'The forsaken merman' and Bridge's 'The forging of the anchor' were performed. The concert was conducted by Mr. Herbert Ellingford, and the chorus work reflected credit on his careful training. Mr. J. F. Newel was the principal solo singer. The selection of the second work was a happy one, as the author of the words, Sir Samuel Ferguson, was a native of Belfast, and the centenary of his birth will be celebrated this month. Sir Samuel, besides being a very learned and cultivated Irish scholar, was far above the average of minor poets, and his native city is naturally proud of his fame.

On January 29 the third of the Queen's University Chamber Concerts had the Brodsky Quartet as its principal attraction, with Madame Gertrude Drinkwater as vocalist. The most notable items were the splendid rendering of Bach's 'Ciaccona,' by Dr. Brodsky, and the performance of Beethoven's last Quartet (Op. 135), which is so rarely heard.

The third subscription concert of the Philharmonic Society was of a miscellaneous character, the Society's own work being restricted to the glorious 'Crucifixus' from Bach's B minor Mass, and some part-songs. The artists engaged were of the best: Herr van Rooy and Madame Edna Thornton, vocalists, with Miss Dorothy Bridson, violin, and Madame Fischer Sobell, pianoforte.

Mr. Ernest Harcourt, conductor of the Norwich Orchestral Union, has been awarded the prize of two guineas for the most suitable setting of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's 'Patrol Song,' written for the Scouts.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Choral Union concert, given in the Town Hall on January 22, comprised Haydn's 'Spring,' from the cantata 'The Seasons,' and Mendelssohn's 'The first Walpurgis night.' Unfortunately, owing to a mishap, the organ was not available, and the conductor, Mr. Thomas Facer had, in consequence, to make cuts and alterations which somewhat upset the proper balance, the chorists scarcely doing justice to their powers. The principal parts were taken by Miss Hattie Molineaux, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. James Coleman. Much better results were attained with the performance of Mendelssohn's work. Here chorus and orchestra were heard to greater advantage; indeed, the whole rendering denoted artistic conception and finish, enhanced by the excellent singing of the soloists, Miss Grace Ivell, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. James Coleman.

The same evening Mr. Arthur Cooke gave a Chopin recital in the large Lecture Theatre of the Midland Institute, in connection with the School of Music of which he has, some short time ago, been appointed one of the professors of the pianoforte. His finest performance, in which he excelled, was the first Scherzo in B minor, Op. 20, known as 'Le banquet infernal.'

An artistic and interesting concert was given in the New Temperance Hall, on January 24. The artists were Miss Maria Ricardi, Miss Marie Wadia, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, Mr. Cecil Pearson, and Mr. Aldo Antonietti (violin), and Miss Mary Burgess (accompanist).

Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford gave a successful concert in the Town Hall on January 25, with the assistance of the sisters Pauline, Ethel, and Hazel Hook, and Mr. Harold Wilde. The instrumental portion of the programme comprised violin and violoncello solos by Mr. Tivadar Nachez and Mr. W. H. Squire. The accompanist was Mr. Arthur E. Godfrey.

The New Birmingham Choral Society gave their second concert of the season in the Town Hall on January 30, under Mr. Rutland Boughton's able conductorship. It was essentially a Folk-song concert, comprising some excellently harmonized versions (unaccompanied) of English, Scottish, Irish and Welsh folk-songs, arranged by Granville Bantock, T. F. Dunhill, D. Gillies, Dr. Bell, and Rutland Boughton. By request, Brahms's cycle of part-songs 'Die Marienlieder' (Songs of Mary) were included in the programme, and of these Mr. Rutland Boughton has made a special study. The whole rendering was artistic and refined, admirable in tone-quality and excellent in phrasing, denoting careful training. The choir is making steady advance in the art of unaccompanied part-singing. Miss Winifred New, a mezzo-soprano not heard here previously, contributed Elgar's songs 'After' and 'The poet's life,' also four Irish folk-songs and three Somersetshire folk-songs, the latter arranged by Cecil Sharp. Violoncello solos were rendered by our excellent local violoncellist, Mr. Willy Lehmann. The accompanist was Mr. Clarence Raybould.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in the Town Hall on February 1, conducted by M. Wassili Safonoff, which proved an event of special attraction, inasmuch as the eminent Russian conductor made his debut here on this occasion. He created an enormous sensation, and with only two rehearsals he seemed to have transformed our local rank and file into an entirely new organization, for they played as they have never done before. His remarkable reading of Beethoven's overture 'Leonora' No. 3, Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, Mozart's Serenade for strings, 'Eine Kleine Nachtmusik,' and Strauss's symphonic tone-poem 'Tod und Verklärung,' was quite a revelation.

Miss Muriel Foster, who has not been heard here since her retirement from the concert-platform after her marriage, was the great attraction at a charity concert given in the Town Hall, on February 8, in aid of the local branch of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, specially organized by Madame Minadieu, a local soprano and teacher of singing. Miss Muriel Foster's glorious voice and dramatic style were once more fully displayed in her artistic rendering of two of Brahms's 'Lieder,' Hubert Parry's 'There,' Delius's 'In the Seraglio garden,' Walford Davies's 'Infant Joy,' and Elgar's 'Oh, soft was the song' and 'Twilight,' from the new song-cycle. The artists associated with Miss Muriel Foster were Miss Dorothy Silk, Madame Minadieu, and Dr. Theo. Lierhammer (vocalists), Miss Fanny Davies and her pupil, Miss Kathleen Arnold (pianoforte). The accompanist was Mr. Hamilton Hartly.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association gave their 252nd concert in the Town Hall, on February 5, under their conductor, Mr. Joseph Adams. The principal choral work was Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' which received an artistic and impressive interpretation; indeed, it was one of the best things the choir have done for some time past. The programme contained almost too many items for a Saturday popular concert, and only passing reference can be made to such well-known numbers as Schubert's 'The song of Miriam,' the same composer's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Elgar's beautiful choral suite, 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' and Sibelius's graphic symphonic poem 'Finlandia.' The vocalist was Miss Euneta Truscott.

Mr. Max Mossel's third drawing room concert of the current series was held at the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on February 10. The whole programme was devoted to a vocal and pianoforte recital by Miss Agnes Nicholls and Miss Frida Kindler, the accompanist being Mr. Hamilton Hartly. Miss Agnes Nicholls, who was in excellent voice, sang nearly twenty songs, all given with consummate art.

Miss Elena Gerhardt gave one of her delightful and artistic recitals of German Lieder in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on February 14, assisted by Miss Paula Hegner, who acted in the dual capacity of accompanist and solo pianist. The Birmingham Temperance Philharmonic Choral Society's concert, given in the Town Hall on February 12, met with great success. The choir sang with much ability, and with fine attack, part-songs by Eaton Fanning, Edward Elgar and Dudley Buck. The rest of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, the principal feature being an operatic recital in costume of Flotow's 'Martha,' Act II., given by Madame Pollack's opera company. Señor José Soler Gomez was the solo violinist. The Clifton Quintet gave their third chamber concert at Queen's College on February 15, which included a scholarly rendering of César Franck's Quartet in D major, and Mozart's Pianoforte and String quartet in G minor.

The Midland Musical Society gave in the Town Hall, on February 19, the complete cycle of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Songs of Hiawatha,' with remarkable artistic results. Mr. A. J. Cotton conducted, and the solo vocalists, Madame Effie Thomas, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Harry Bannister, were of distinct merit.

BRISTOL.

The Bristol Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Maurice Alexander, gave a concert at the Victoria Rooms on February 2. Under the direction of Mr. F. S. Gardner some favourable compositions were interpreted in a satisfactory manner. The most important works performed were Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony and Beethoven's Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello with orchestra, (Op. 56). The soloists in the latter were Messrs. G. F. Blanchard, Percival Hodgson, and Roger Bucknall. Other features in the programme were Wagner's overture to 'Die Meistersinger,' Ballet Suite No. 1 (Gluck-Mottl), and Sullivan's 'Di Ballo' Overture. Madame Le Mar, the vocalist, experienced an enthusiastic reception, and her songs were much admired.

Colston Hall was crowded on February 3, when the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society had their Ladies' Night. Mr. Lloyd Chandos was the special soloist, and he distinguished himself in several pieces with the choir, his principal effort being in R. Genée's 'Italian Salad,' which in accordance with the desire of the auditors was repeated. A novelty as far as the choir was concerned consisted of 'Walpurga,' a choral ballad by F. Hegar, full of contrasts. It produced a favourable impression. Other contributions which found favour were 'The old soldier's dream' (Peter Cornelius), 'The death of Hector' (Bexfield), 'Feasting, I watch' (Elgar), and 'When evening's twilight' (J. L. Hatton). Under the efficient direction of Mr. George Riseley, the programme was admirably rendered, and probably no concert given by the Society from its inception sixty-six years ago has been more enjoyed. On February 5, to mark their appreciation of the honour conferred upon Mr. Riseley by his appointment as Sheriff of Bristol, the Society entertained him at a complimentary supper at the Grand Hotel, under the presidency of Mr. S. L. Usher.

The third of the Subscription Chamber Concerts at the Victoria Rooms on February 7 was well attended, the players being Miss Fanny Davies (pianoforte), M. Achille Rivarde (violin), and Mr. Johann C. Hock (violoncello). Miss Davies and M. Rivarde were associated in Beethoven's Sonata in A major (Op. 4), and their fine interpretation was much appreciated. Another gratifying performance was Tchaikovsky's Trio (Op. 50). There were solos for the pianoforte and violin, and the latter were ably accompanied by Mr. W. E. Fowler.

On February 10 the Clifton Quintet gave their third concert of the season at the Victoria Rooms, and gratified a large audience with their effective rendering of some admired compositions. The performers were Messrs. Maurice Alexander and Ernest Lane (violins), Alfred Best (viola), Percy Lewis (violoncello), and Herbert Parsons (pianoforte). The scheme comprised César Franck's Quartet in D major for strings, Mozart's Quartet in G minor for pianoforte, violin, viola and violoncello, and solos by Messrs. Alexander and Parsons. Miss Evelyn Beeton, the vocalist, charmed the audience by her tasteful delivery of German Lieder.

Mr. Edwin H. Lemare gave a series of recitals on the five organ at Colston Hall on February 9 and 10, with remarkable success. The programmes comprised a varied and interesting selection both of pure organ music and of arrangements of orchestral music, prominent among the former being Rheinberger's twelfth Sonata, Bach's Toccata in F and Prelude and Fugue in F, Mendelssohn's first Organ sonata, and the recitalist's own Rondo capriccio, while among the latter were Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantaisie, 'Romeo and Juliet,' and some Wagnerian selections.

There was considerable interest experienced in a lecture on 'Milton and Music' by Sir Frederick Bridge in the Hall of the Merchant Venturers' Technical College, on February 16. The setting of 'Comus' by Henry Lawes was interpreted by Miss Whitmore, Mr. H. Clutterbuck, members of the Bristol Cathedral choir, and a string quartet, under Mr. Hubert Hunt. The music was excellently rendered, and Sir Frederick Bridge complimented those who took part.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

With popular prices, and under special conditions enforced by the Corporation, Mr. David Parkes used the Plymouth Guildhall for the appearance of his excellent male choir, known as the Plymouth Orpheus, on January 26. This band of ninety well-balanced voices evidenced good training by their distinct enunciation, accurate intonation and attainment of special effects in pieces by Boulanger, Cornelius, Johnson, and MacDowell ('The dance of the Gnomes'). Mr. Parkes gave organ solos; Madame Tydfil Freeman was the vocalist, and Miss Daisy Hawke the pianist. For charitable purposes four performances were given by the operatic society of St. Dunstan's Abbey School, commencing on January 31, of a well-arranged interlude from Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' under the direction of the Misses Bartlett, Beattie and Doris Hambley, who also played the accompaniments. The Zion male-voice choir gave a concert in the Elburton suburb, conducted by the Rev. S. G. Jenkins, on February 2, and on the same date at Plymouth, Dr. Weekes' Orchestral Society gave its second concert, including the symphonies Haydn in G, No. 13, and Tchaikovsky's 'Pathétique,' and a novelty was given in Landon Ronald's 'Birthday overture.' Mr. Walter Weekes conducted the second half of the programme, including the Tchaikovsky Symphony. A miscellaneous concert on February 7, at Plymouth, brought forward an excellent little orchestra of twenty players conducted by Mr. R. Ball, when a 'Serenade' by Leoncavallo, and a 'Rêverie du soir' (Saint-Saëns) were in the programme. The soloists were Mrs. H. R. Freeman (violoncello), Miss Florence Woolland (violin), and a quartet of vocalists. Mr. Frank Winterbottom, at his third Symphony concert at Stonehouse, on February 15, introduced a novelty in the Scherzo 'D'après une ballade de Goethe' ('L'Apprenti sorcier') of Dukas, and also a Quartet for strings by Claudius Blanc (Messrs. Wellington, Wills, Dalling and Pike). The Symphony was Beethoven No. 1.

The Ottery St. Mary choir, on February 8, gave Stainer's 'St. Mary Magdalen,' when it was gratifying to note a marked improvement, especially in the outside parts. Mr. Stanley Chipperfield conducted. The Plympton Choral Society gave a concert on February 8, under its new conductor, Mr. David Parkes (Mr. Walter Weekes having resigned), when Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander' was performed, and several part-songs. The solo vocalists were Miss Minnie Searle and Mr. Percy Taylor. It is painful to record that owing to the rinking craze the Ivybridge Choral Society (conducted by Mr. Arthur Coombe) has ceased to exist, partly for want of a hall; and the Mannamead and Muley Choral Society, which has done artistic work under Mr. Manley Martin, has likewise come to an end, owing to the absorption of the members in the popular fad.

CORNWALL.

On January 30 the Torpoint String Band, conducted by Mr. H. J. Oliver, gave a concert which included a performance, with voices, of Jamouneau's cantata 'The coming of the Kingdom of Christ,' the band acquitting itself well. Lostwithiel Choral Society, at its fifth annual concert on February 2, sang Barnett's 'The ancient mariner,' Mr. A. E. Russell obtaining very good results. The principals were the Misses Euneta Truscott and B. Daniell, and Messrs. A. H. Hallett and A. E. Old. Cowen's 'The rose maiden' was creditably performed at the small village of Millbrook by the Choral and Orchestral Societies on February 3. Mr. Wedlake, the conductor, deserving praise for his evidently careful work. The performances of the Launceston Choral Society are among the best to be heard in the county. Mr. C. S. Parsonson being conductor and a musician of high attainment. McCunn's 'The lay of the last minstrel' was given on February 3. Mr. Parsonson also gave pianoforte solos by Chopin, and the band was led by Mr. A. E. Searle, who also played violin solos. Mr. Seymour Pile, conductor of the Truro Orchestral Society, obtained good performances on February 3 of a Haydn Symphony (No. 2) and Beethoven's No. 5. Considering the youth of the Society, the playing must be classed as very good. On February 4, at Devoran, the Choral Class gave a programme consisting of choruses and part-songs, conducted by Mr. W. R. Coch; and at Falmouth, on February 7, complete success attended the performance of an operetta 'Cinderella,' by the St. Mary's Choral Class, conducted by Miss E. B. Blight.

DUBLIN.

On February 3, the Dublin Orchestral Society (conductor, Dr. M. Esposito) gave the first concert for the season. The programme was as follows:—Cherubini's overture 'Les deux journées,' Schubert's Symphony in C (first time in Ireland), Wagner's 'Charfreitags Zauber,' Paul Dukas's 'L'apprenti sorcier,' Beethoven's 'Leonore' No. 3.

On February 10, a new Choral Society made its first appearance before a Dublin audience—the Orpheus Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Charles Kelly, Vicar-Choral of St. Patrick's Cathedral. The choir was heard to advantage in the following unaccompanied choral items: 'Hosanna to the son of David,' Orlando Gibbons; 'The victor's return,' Mendelssohn; 'O gladsome Light,' Sullivan; 'Homeward,' Leslie; 'Lady, rise! sweet morn's awaking,' Leslie; 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' Schubert (ladies' voices only); and 'In absence,' Buck (male voices only). Miss Agnes Treacy, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. Clyde Twelveteires (violinist), were the soloists. Mr. George Hewson acted as accompanist.

The chief musical event of the past few months was the production for the first time in English of Saint-Saëns's opera 'Samson and Delilah' by the Moody-Manners Opera Company, at the Theatre Royal. The work created much enthusiasm, and was repeated several times during a very successful season. Of the artists who took part in the first performance, three were of Irish birth, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, Mr. William Dever and Mr. Charles Magrath. Miss Zélie de Lussan was the Delilah. Herr Eckhold conducted.

The Sunday Orchestral Concerts (conductor, Dr. Esposito) continue to be well patronised. The programmes since the Christmas holidays have included the following Symphonies: Haydn in D, Beethoven No. 7, and Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll.' The vocalists were Madame de Vere-Sapio, Mr. Percy Whitehead, and the Misses Alice Rafter, Nettie Edwards and Queenie Eaton.

The chamber music recitals at the Royal Dublin Society have been given by the Wessely Quartet (who played for the first time here the Dohnányi Quartet in D flat); Miss Annie Lord, pianoforte recital; the Brodsky Quartet, the Walenn Quartet (their first appearance here), and the Manchester Trio (also a first appearance here). On February 2, Mr. Carl Armbruster gave an interesting lecture on 'The songs of Johannes Brahms,' assisted by Miss Pauline Cramer as vocalist.

The Feis Ceoil, or Irish musical festival, is fixed for May 9 and following days. The adjudicators are Mr. T. Tertius Noble, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, Signor Carlo Albanesi, Mr. Sigmund Beel and Mr. J. Ord Hume.

EDINBURGH.

At the tenth of Messrs. Paterson's orchestral concerts, given in the McEwan Hall on January 24, Mr. Landon Ronald conducted fine performances of works by Beethoven, Schubert, Tchaikovsky and others. The great attraction at the eleventh concert, on January 31, Dr. Cowen conducting, was the appearance of M. Emil Sauer, who played Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A minor in superb style. The programme of the last concert, on February 9, with the exception of Haydn's Symphony in G, was devoted to excerpts from Wagner's compositions. Associated with the orchestra, M. Anton van Rooy created a great impression by his dramatic singing of the Aria from 'The Flying Dutchman,' Hans Sachs's monologue 'Wahn! Wahn!' from 'Die Meistersinger,' and 'Wotan's farewell' and the 'Fire Music' from the 'Götterdämmerung.' The purely orchestral numbers included the Introduction to Act III, and Dance of the Apprentices from 'Die Meistersinger,' the interlude from 'Siegfried,' the Funeral March 'Waldweben' from the 'Götterdämmerung,' and the 'Ride of the Valkyries.'

The third Historical Concert, given in the University Music Class-room on January 26, took the form of a recital of pianoforte compositions and songs by Schumann, dating from the period 1829-1840. The performers were Miss Fanny Davies and Miss Jean Waterston, with Mr. A. M. Henderson as accompanist.

An interesting concert was given by the Edinburgh Junior Choral Society (conductor, Mr. E. W. Winning), in the Livingstone Hall, on February 4. The chief item in the programme was Sir F. Bridge's cantata 'The Frogs and the Ox,' which received a highly creditable rendering, the singing of the choir giving abundant evidence of careful training.

The Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. T. H. Collinson) gave their second concert of the season in the Music Hall, on February 7. The programme included Beethoven's 'Leonora' Overture (No. 2), Bizet's 'Petit Suite,' Percy Pitt's 'Scène de Ballet,' and the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger.' Though not reaching the level of professional attainments, the efforts of the orchestra were highly meritorious, and reflected much credit on the conductor. Miss Winifred Nicholson won great praise for her excellent performance of the pianoforte part of Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto, and Miss Jessie Forbes sang with much acceptance Gluck's 'Che farò,' and other pieces.

The annual concert of Mr. Kirkhope's Choir was given in the Music Hall, on February 18. The work performed was Sir Hubert Parry's 'Judith,' and the choir was supported by an excellent orchestra led by Mr. Siegl. Throughout the evening, under Mr. Kirkhope's able direction, the choir sang with all its accustomed unity of expression, certainty of attack, and tunefulness. The soloists, who all acquitted themselves admirably, were Madame Agnes Nicholls, Madame Anita Sutherland, Miss Winifred Pullon, Mr. Walter Hyde and Mr. Alfred C. Young—a local baritone who is rapidly making a name for himself.

GLASGOW.

On January 25 the Choral Union gave a performance of Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' and Cliffe's 'Ode to the North-east wind.' Both works had the charm of novelty, the former not having had a place on the Choral Union's programmes for many years past and the latter being quite new. Under Dr. Coward's inspiring guidance the choruses were sung with fine effect. The solo music in Handel's work was given by Miss Esta d'Argo and Messrs. Webster Millar, Joseph Cheetham and Herbert Brown, the last-named receiving a well-deserved ovation for his rendering of 'O ruddier than the cherry.' A memorable feature of the thirteenth Classical Concert on February 1 was the masterly performance of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A minor by Mr. Emil Sauer, whose magnificent playing evoked an enthusiasm seldom witnessed at these concerts. The programme also included two novelties—Strauss's 'Macbeth,' and 'Danse Cosaque' from Tchaikovsky's 'Mazeppa,' the first-named, although splendidly played by the Scottish Orchestra, being received with very mixed feelings by the audience.

The Choral Union's performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, on February 8, was a red-letter day in the history of music in Glasgow. To mark the importance of the production of this stupendous work—the first complete performance in Scotland—the Choral and Orchestral Union invited ticket-holders to attend the final rehearsal, a much-prized privilege of which many availed themselves. Considering the enormous difficulty of Bach's choral writing, the Choral Union and Dr. Coward are to be congratulated on their notable performance. The choir, although somewhat light in the soprano section, showed great staying-power, and their rendering of certain numbers, notably the 'Sanctus,' was inspiring. The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Madame Amy Dewhurst, and Messrs. Lloyd Chandos and Montague Borwell, the accompaniments being given by the Scottish Orchestra. A special word of praise is due to Mr. J. E. Hodgson for his excellent playing of the organ part. The annual plébiscite concert on February 12 brought the Choral and Orchestral Union's present season to a close.

The Operatic Society connected with the Athenæum School of Music gave a week's performances of Victor Massé's 'Les noces de Jeannette' and Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' beginning on February 14. Since Mr. Henri Verbruggen assumed direction of the Society, its artistic advance has been very marked, and the appearance made by the students this year was most praiseworthy, both vocally and histrionically. A feature of the performances was the excellent playing of the accompaniments by the students' orchestra. At his fourth Chamber Concert, on February 17, Mr. A. H. Henderson presented an 'all-British' programme, the composers drawn upon being Messrs. W. Y. Hurlstone, James Friskin, and Donald Tovey. Interest naturally centred in the work of Mr. Friskin, a young townsman who has had a very successful career at the Royal College of Music. His Quintet in C minor for pianoforte and strings proved to be the most ambitious number on the programme, and it was well received, especially with respect to the first and last movements. Mr. Friskin played the pianoforte part, and was ably supported by Miss Bessie Spence (1st violin), Mr. Alfred Bue (2nd violin), Mr. John Daly (viola), and Mr. W. H. Sasbach (violinello).

GLOUCESTER AND DISTRICT.

The annual concert of the Cirencester Choral Society, of which Mr. A. H. Gibbons is conductor, was given in the Bingham Hall on February 8, and was well attended. Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' was the chief work performed, with Miss Norah Newport, Mr. W. H. Court and Mr. Wilson Tovey as soloists. Mr. J. E. R. Teague played, in excellent style, some violinello solos, in addition to songs by the principals above mentioned. Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm completed the concert, Miss Lily Orpet taking the solo part with considerable success.

On February 3, the Wotton-under-Edge Tabernacle Choral Society gave a good performance of Cowen's 'Sleeping Beauty,' the soloists being Miss Minnie Embrey, Miss Clara Aldersley, Mr. Herbert Sanderson, and Mr. P. Howard Grey.

A small orchestra was efficiently led by Mr. J. Woodward, and Mr. Tapscott conducted the performance with success.

'The Building of the ship' was the work selected by the Tetbury Philharmonic Society for their annual concert, followed by Miss Finden's Burmese story in song, entitled 'The pagoda of flowers.' Mr. F. N. Baxter conducted good performances of both these works, the small orchestra being led by Mr. Baxter, and Miss Lilian Freeth, Miss Calcutt, Messrs. Richards and Batey being the soloists.

The concert of the Newent Choral Society, given in the New Assembly Hall on February 3, was a great success, quite a good performance being given of Hodson's 'Golden Legend.' The chorus was augmented by members of the Gloucester Festival Class, and a small but efficient orchestra was led by Mr. J. Woodward (Gloucester). The soloists were Miss Kate Bailey, Miss Olive Power, Miss Hutchinson, Mr. Robins, Mr. Sanderson, Mr. Vincent Jones and Mr. Morton, and the conductor was Precentor Fleming, of Gloucester Cathedral.

The second concert of the Gloucester Choral Society, on February 15, was devoted to a performance of 'Elijah,' with band and chorus of over 200, under the direction of Dr. A. Herbert Brewer. The solos were taken by Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Florence Taylor, Mr. Roland Jackson and Mr. P. Driver, in place of Mr. Arthur Wynn, who had to give up the engagement at the last moment through indisposition. Mr. W. H. Reed led the band, and the concert was an artistic success.

LIVERPOOL.

The programme of the 149th concert of the Société Armonica on January 29 contained Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, of which an intelligent performance was given under Mr. Akeroyd's direction. Tchaikovsky's Variations on a Roccoco theme for violoncello and orchestra were cleverly played by Mr. H. Van Damme, and the vocalist was Mr. John Booth, a promising young tenor.

At the eighth concert of the Philharmonic Society, on January 25, the vocalist was Signor Tamini, and Madame Renée Chemet gave a skilful performance of the solo violin part in Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' Dr. Cowen conducted Dvořák's Overture 'In der Natur,' Mozart's beautiful Serenade in D (No. 9), and Richard Strauss's spirited 'Fest Marsch,' an early work, unrepresentative of the composer's later style. The ninth concert, on February 8, was chiefly devoted to Wagner, of whose first act of 'Die Walküre' and final duet from 'Siegfried' a performance was given which, in the absence of scenic illusion and surroundings, was lacking in complete effect. Cordial recognition of the excellent vocalism of Madame Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Walter Hyde and Mr. Robert Radford is due, as also to the playing of the powerful orchestra which Dr. Cowen so ably directs. The choir was agreeably heard in four numbers (Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 6) from Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon' choral suite, in which Mr. George Baker was the baritone soloist.

An interesting and instructive paper on Richard Strauss and his works was read by Dr. E. Markham Lee, to the Liverpool section of the I.S.M., on February 12, when the lecturer dealt with his subject very ably, not only from a literary point of view, but also in his pianoforte exposition of the composer's themes and methods. Mrs. Howard Stephens was the vocalist.

Brahms's Sonata in D minor (Op. 108) for violin and pianoforte was admirably interpreted by Mr. Alfred Ross and Madame Marguerite Stilwell (Mrs. Alfred Ross) at their recital on January 27, and the latter accomplished pianist was heard with special interest in Debussy's Petite Suite, 'Children's corner.'

The Liscard Orchestral Society, whose concerts are very popular, performed an interesting selection on February 5, which included Saint-Saëns's Concerto for viola (Op. 33), skilfully played by Mr. T. Rimmer, and the orchestra of sixty, conducted by Mr. P. R. Smart, were heard in Beethoven's 'Leonora' No. 3 Overture, and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Characteristic Waltzes' (Op. 22). The vocalist, Miss Mary Lund, sang Landon Ronald's scena 'Adonais.'

The fourth Schiever Chamber Concert on February 5 was devoted to three Beethoven Quartets—B flat major, Op. 18, F major, Op. 59, and A minor, Op. 132—which were played in the true interpretative spirit by Mr. Ernst Schiever and his associates, Messrs. Alfred Ross, T. Kimmner, and W. Hutton.

Concerts by some young musical aspirants which are worthy of favourable mention include the recital given by Miss Constance Bradford (pianoforte) and Miss Grace Bradford (violin), on February 2; by Miss Millie Mack (pianoforte), assisted by Mr. Leo Ross (violoncello), on February 7; and by Miss Ada Ellwood (pianoforte), on February 18. In the performances of these young débutantes their playing exhibited evidence of careful training and diligent study, and also of innate musical ability.

The presence of Miss Ethel Smyth, who conducted her overture 'The Wreckers' and also her 'Anacreontic Ode' (sung by Mr. Robert Radford) at the Symphony Orchestra's concert on February 1, gave a strong and attractive personal note to an exceptionally interesting programme, which contained the Symphony in G minor by Kalinnikov, a Russian composer whose music and methods owe something to the influence of Tchaikovsky, Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture and 'Bees' wedding' (orchestrated by Guiraud) were heard in effective contrast.

A performance of Sullivan's oratorio 'The prodigal son' was directed by Mr. A. E. Workman at Emmanuel Church, Bootle, on February 16. The accompaniments were sustained by a small stringed orchestra and organ (Mr. W. A. Roberts). Preceding the oratorio, Mr. Workman's tuneful anthem, 'The Lord is my shepherd,' was sung.

The Symphony Orchestra Concert, on February 15, was conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood, whose arrangement as a New Suite of three movements from J. S. Bach's organ works (first Organ concerto, fourth and sixth Organ sonatas) was pleasantly heard. The programme also contained Mozart's 'Haffner' Symphony in D, Tchaikovsky's fantasia overture, 'Romeo and Juliet,' and Debussy's 'L'Après-midi d'un faune.' In Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto No. 4, in G major, Miss Tosta di Beneci exhibited an extremely sensitive and delicate touch, and her playing, if not of the robust order, has the rarer charm of tenderness.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The feelings of Manchester concert-goers during the last month may be better imagined than described as they have read of the 'Ring' dramas at Edinburgh, and the preparations at Covent Garden, not to mention such trifles as Strauss's 'Elektra,' or operas by Debussy and Delius during the Beecham season in London. How galling it is to think that, at this time of day, with that veteran Wagnerite Richter in our midst, we should be pottering about with concert performances of excerpts from 'Walküre,' 'Siegfried' or 'Götterdämmerung'! Nothing fills our Free Trade Hall better than a Hallé Wagnerian programme, and highly enjoyable as they invariably are, no keen music-lover here can resist some such reflections as those expressed above. In the past, Manchester may with some justice have been regarded as the 'metropolis of music,' but that pride of place is rapidly being lost. At present it looks long odds on the improbability of the coming generation of Lancashire music-lovers—still less the present one—ever having the chance of Wagnerian drama on the stage; but then 'You never can tell'—the repertory theatre came when it had been well-nigh given up in despair. Wagner on the concert platform is like Shakespeare by Brandram—good only as a substitute for something better, and we are not true Wagnerians unless such concerts as the Hallé concert of February 3 fill us with a divine discontent; every Wagner concert makes one's artistic soul clamour for the theatre and an opera season. But we are very grateful to Richter; he gives us of his best, and as yet there are no climaxes like his. As was splendidly said the other day in the Manchester Guardian—'Pater incensu deus': the Olympian shows in the majestic discipline of his melodic advance, big with fate, but regular and calm, relentless and single-minded as the march of Napier's British infantry up the hill at Albuera, fervid but not tumultuous with the depth not the impotence of emotion.'

Yet these very virtues may appear as defects when, as at the succeeding concert, he played Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic Symphony'; he does not bring out the languor, the oppression, the pessimism, and the highly-wrought tragic emotion, although in that marvellously eloquent Scherzomarch of the third movement his monumental treatment is peerless. At this same concert we had Brodsky in Bach—for here we can scarcely help thus associating the two names, much as we did Joachim with Beethoven's, and Sarasate with Mendelssohn's Violin concertos—and the Bach A minor concerto is Brodsky's special piece. In the divine melody of the Andante he poured out the real spirit of the music, and in the Hellmesberger cadenza in the Finale—regarded as probably the best-written excursus of its kind—the rapid passages towards the close were done with the utmost lightness and freedom.

If Richter had done nothing else here his persistent preaching of the gospel according to Liszt would have earned for him our lasting gratitude; he, more than anybody else, has laboured to remove from Manchester the reproach that 'they do not like Liszt,' and anybody who will compare the reception to-day of either his orchestral or pianoforte works with that of a dozen years ago must be impressed by the change. On February 10, Egon Petri played a seldom-heard Mozart Pianoforte concerto, and Liszt's 'Spanish' Rhapsody with the very clever orchestration by Busoni (who was Petri's master). Busoni's arrangement is on the concerto principle, having majestic themes in the earlier part, and dance rhythms with sparkling ornamental variations afterwards. Mr. Petri's playing was incredibly brilliant, and quite seemed to dazzle the audience.

On February 19 came a revival of

LISZT'S 'LEGEND OF ST. ELIZABETH.'

The preparation of this oratorio had undoubtedly been a labour of love for that sturdy Lisztianer, Hans Richter, who is so thoroughly imbued with the national associations of the Hungarian melodies used throughout the work. The choir had no difficulty with the straightforward part-writing, and the soloists were Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Ethel Wood, and Messrs. Robert Burrett, Fowler Burton and Francis Harford. Interest in the work flagged somewhat up to the end of the 'Crusaders' scene, but after the interval one was conscious in the three later scenes of a new note of deeper conviction in the music—an intenser glow, and Scenes V. and VI. swept us up to loftier emotional heights. The actual time of performance without cuts was two hours and twenty-six minutes. There would appear to be good grounds for doubting the accuracy of the statement made in the preface to the English edition, from the pen of Mr. C. A. Barry, that it 'was specially composed for a festival at the Wartburg on August 28, 1867,' as its first performance was at Pesth two years earlier, in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Pesth Conservatoire.

The series of Intermezzi for string orchestra by Enrico Bossi, published under the title of 'Gordoniani'—being based presumably on the works of the Italian poet Goldoni—will never take high rank in the literature of the string orchestra. Of the half-dozen novelties promised for this season, we have now had four, two of which have certainly proved successful, viz., Sibelius's 'Värsång' and Bantock's 'Pierrot of the Minute,' but if nothing better can be found among the work of Continental writers than Alexander Ritter's 'Sursum Corda' or this Bossi String suite, then may it be suggested to the responsible parties that native composers such as Percy Pitt, Frank Bridge, Holbrooke, Delius, have each produced orchestral compositions far worthier of performance than the two works just named, and at the Hallé Concerts so far only Mr. Pitt has had a hearing.

The programme of the ninth Promenade Concert, under Mr. Speelman, was largely made up of orchestral items illustrating dance movements, the most instructive being Gluck's ballet-music in Felix Mottl's arrangement. Mr. Albert Holt was the vocalist, and Mr. Charles Collier's harp solos gave great delight. Music of the French school, but not, alas! of the modern section, was played by the Society on February 19. Mr. T. Nicholls conducted the concert.

The past month has been crowded with lieder-abend and concerts of chamber-music. In the former class, interest centred chiefly in the re-appearance of Mr. George Henschel at the Gentlemen's Concert on February 2, when he accompanied himself in operatic arias by Handel and Cimarosa, and lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Liszt and Loewe.

On February 7, Manchester had its first complete performance of Max Mayer's song-cycle, 'Maeva' (based on the lyrics from Miss Eva Gore-Booth's dramas), at a meeting of the College of Music Club. Miss Annie Worsley sang them to the accompaniment of the composer, the outstanding feature being the complete unity of style and understanding revealed. The composer read over the poem, with explanatory remarks, before each number of the cycle was performed, in the manner of Hugo Wolf. The same evening Miss Elizabeth Meacham and Miss Nellie Anderton sang numerous lieder for soprano and contralto, along with several Schumann and Brahms duets, accompanied by Miss Helena McCullagh. Mention must be made of a recital by Mr. James Richardson and Madame Alice Lamb, in which compositions of Mr. Richardson for violoncello and also for voice figured prominently.

On February 14, at Miss Edith Robinson's quartet concert, Donald Tovey's Quintet in C major for pianoforte and strings (still in MS.) was given with the composer at the pianoforte. The work compels attention by its free, vigorous style and unmistakable British idiom; his is a strong, progressive nature, perhaps somewhat deficient in fancy, but distinctly arresting. Along with Miss Robinson he played Brahms's D minor Sonata. Miss Muriel Robinson sang works by Handel, Scarlatti, Schumann, Liszt and Brahms.

Mr. Egon Petri's Beethoven Sonata recitals at the Islington Hall, in connection with the Ancients Brotherhood, were brought to a triumphant conclusion on February 16. Here is a noble movement right in the heart of Manchester slumdom, and no more genuine musical appreciation is to be found anywhere than among these sons of toil. In five recitals Mr. Petri has gone through all the sonatas, as he did last year at the University, but from the student's point of view the later series possessed the greater value. Mr. Petri possesses practically all the attributes of the really great pianist; he grips one's imagination at once, and never releases his hold.

The Chopin Centenary was marked by a recital, on February 21, by another of our resident pianists, Mr. Isidor Cohen.

The 275th concert of the Manchester Vocal Society was the occasion of the regrettable announcement that Dr. Watson would retire from his position as music director at the close of this season. Wesley's motet, 'In exitu Israel,' and three scenes from Purcell's 'King Arthur' (the Camp scene, the Song of Victory, the Frost scene) were the principal features of a lengthy and varied programme.

The Manchester District Band of Hope Choral Union, with an amateur orchestra largely recruited from the Queen Street P.S.A. Brotherhood, gave a performance recently of Handel's 'Judas,' under the conductorship of Mr. W. Chandos Wilson.

At the Gaiety Theatre there has been a revival of ancient dances to ancient music. Miss Nellie Chaplin and numerous assistants, with harpsichord, viols, gamba and hautboy, played old 17th century selections, besides enabling one to perceive the very intimate relation then existent between music and the dance.

With reference to the statement in our last issue that Berlioz's 'Faust' 'has never been heard in Lancashire outside Manchester,' we are informed that the work has been given at Preston on two previous occasions—1882 and the early nineties.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union announce that at the first concert of next season Professor Granville Bantock will conduct Parts II. and III. of his 'Omar Khayyam.' Part I. was given at the recent festival, and proved one of the most popular works of the week, both with choir and audience, so that the announcement has given much satisfaction to musical circles in the neighbourhood. At the second concert, Bach's B minor Mass will be repeated.

On February 1st, Mr. Alfred Wall (violin) and Mr. S. Oppenheim (pianoforte) gave the 'Kreutzer' Sonata and other works at the concert of the Newcastle Musical Society. Miss Coward, daughter of the well-known chorus-master, sang several songs.

Mozart's and Beethoven's String quintets in C were played with great vigour by the Brodsky Quartet, augmented by Mr. Alfred Barker, at the Chamber Music Society's concert on February 15. Dr. Brodsky played Bach's 'Chaconne' with great mastery and insight; it was one of the most satisfying interpretations the writer has heard.

On February 17, Bach's 'Coffee' and 'Peasants' cantatas were given by the Classical Concert Society. The vocalists were Miss Doris Simpson, Messrs. Roland Jackson and Campbell McInnes. The feature of the evening was the masterly pianoforte-playing of Mr. James M. Preston, a well-known local organist, in Bach's Concerto in D minor for pianoforte and strings. Unfortunately the Concerto and cantatas were marred by an inefficient body of strings.

The same evening, Mr. R. Buhlig (pianoforte) and Mr. Borsdorf (horn) appeared at a Chamber Concert given at Sunderland by Mr. Andrew Bevan.

NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

A successful concert was given by the Norwich Philharmonic Society at St. Andrew's Hall, on February 3, when Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony in A flat received its first hearing in Norwich, and was listened to with the greatest interest by a large audience, the applause at the end being most enthusiastic. Dr. Bates deserves hearty congratulations for the excellence of the performance and the great advance made by the Society in recent years. The other items included the overture to the 'The Magic Flute' (Mozart) and 'Marche Slave.' Mrs. George Swinton was the vocalist.

The Saturday Popular Concerts conducted by Dr. Bunnett under the direction of the Municipality are having a successful season, and the committee organizing the recitals have arranged for a performance of Miss Joan Trevalsa's 'Peter Pan' song-cycle on the last evening of the season.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

On February 10, the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society gave a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust.' The choir showed to greater advantage, the tone being brighter, the attack and finish firmer and more decided than we have lately heard it. The soloists were Madame Esta d'Argo, Mr. Walter Hyde, Mr. Harry Dearth, Mr. Ivor Foster, Madame Wilson Moulds and Mr. Will Downing. Mr. Allen Gill conducted.

Special interest was taken in the Misses Chaplin's performance of old music and dances, with exquisite taste, on February 17. The opportunity of hearing the music of two or three centuries ago does not often occur, and those who are curious in these matters owe the Misses Chaplin a great debt of gratitude. The vocal items were given by Miss Flora Mann.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

Local musical energies are being mainly directed to the organization of the chorus for the next festival, the dates of which have been fixed for April 26, 1911, and two following days. Nearly 550 applications for 300 places have been made, and the work of testing has already begun.

It is announced that the results of the two trial orchestral promenade concerts recently given were such as to justify a continuance of the venture. Two more concerts will be given in the Albert Hall, on March 3 and 17. The works to be given include Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto No. 3, Grieg's Pianoforte concerto in A minor, and a series of Wagner selections. A more extended series of concerts will probably be arranged for next season.

An excellent concert was given on February 7 by a new choral body, the St. Oswald's Choral Society, at Millhouses. Mr. J. C. Simon trained and conducted an earnest, well-intentioned and fairly proficient body of singers, who gave a good account of the choral portions of Cowen's 'The rose maiden.' Successful concerts have also been given by the Sheffield Male Glee and Madrigal Society, under Mr. W. H. Robinson, and by the St. Andrew's Sharrow Choral Society (Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm), conducted by Mr. O. C. Owrld.

An interesting revival of Beaumont and Fletcher's satirical comedy 'The Knight of the burning pestle,' given by the School of Art Musical and Dramatic Club, was notable for some well-rendered songs and dances of the period, and the playing of appropriate incidental music by a string orchestra under Mr. A. Bagshaw.

At the fourth concert of the Sheffield Chamber Music Society, Mr. Georg Ellenberger's quartet party played works by Haydn (the 'Emperor' Quartet), Beethoven (Op. 18, No. 2) and Brahms (Op. 51, No. 1). The players secured an excellent ensemble, while the interpretations were scholarly and full of interest.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

The Leeds Philharmonic Society, with which the Subscription Concerts are now completely amalgamated, gave a concert of chamber music on January 26, the programme including Beethoven's early Quintet for wind and pianoforte (Op. 28) and Schubert's Octet, which were played by a party of the principals of the Queen's Hall Orchestra with great refinement. Mr. Hamilton Harty was the pianist, and Mrs. George Swinton gave much pleasure by her fine singing of a number of modern and unhackneyed songs.

Three of the Municipal Concerts have been crowded into the last month, the election having been the cause of a postponement of one of the series. On January 29 we had some evidence of the quality of the individual members of the orchestra in the fact that one of the rank and file of the strings, Mr. Montagu-Nathan, undertook the solo part in Beethoven's Violin concerto, and acquitted himself creditably of a difficult task. The symphony was Dvorák's 'New World,' a favourite one with Mr. Fricker and his orchestra, and no less popular with their audiences. On February 5, Mr. Julian Clifford took Mr. Fricker's place as conductor and gave a very interesting performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony. Miss Ella Child, a local pianist who has been studying under Busoni, played Liszt's E flat Concerto brilliantly, and at the same time with artistic feeling, and Mr. Oldbury's sympathetic voice and style gave charm to the songs he contributed. On February 12, Mr. Fricker resumed the reins and conducted a programme which observed the Chopin Centenary by including, among other things, the E minor Pianoforte concerto, the solo part in which was played brilliantly, if with some lack of reserve, by a young pianist, Mr. Leopold Schulz. Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien' and Stanford's first Irish Rhapsody were among the more striking features of the programme.

Four chamber concerts, in addition to that of the Philharmonic series already mentioned, have to be chronicled. On February 2 the ladies' string quartet organized and led by Miss Alice Simpkin gave a concert, at which they gallantly attempted Beethoven's first 'Rasumowsky' Quartet in F, a difficult task which they accomplished with a considerable measure of success, though they achieved still better results in the 'Phantasy' with which Mr. Waldo Warner won the Cobbett prize in 1905, and in Mozart's famous Quartet in C from the Haydn set. On February 11 the Leeds Bohemian concert had a particular interest in that it brought forward a new work of quite exceptional merit by a local musician. Mr. A. E. Grimshaw's series of Variations on a theme in G minor, supplied by a friend (Mrs. A. Herz), is not only most interesting in construction, but it shows an uncommon aptitude in writing for the string quartet. The treatment of the variation form is free, and goes far beyond the old-fashioned convention of decorative figures applied to the original subject, being more in the nature of symphonic development, and the work has a power and originality that entitle it to a much wider recognition. Another feature of the programme was a Quartet in G minor by Glière, a contemporary Russian composer, very characteristic of the school in its strong effects, which sometimes almost transgress the natural limitations of the string quartet. The Rasch Quartet, on February 16, gave a concert at which César Franck's Pianoforte quintet in F minor (with Mr. Percy Richardson as pianist) was the chief feature of a programme that also included Dvorák's Quartet in E flat (Op. 51), and some isolated movements by Haydn and Mendelssohn. Yet another string quartet concert, given by Mr. Montagu-Nathan on January 27—when Quartets by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven were played—calls for brief mention, as does the re-appearance of Mr. Emil Sauer, after a long absence from Leeds, at one of Messrs. Haddock's musical evenings, on February 15, when he gave a recital with a rather conventional programme, including the 'Appassionata' Sonata, of which he gave a really magisterial interpretation, dignified and full of colour. The Parish Church choir's annual concert on February 3 deserves mention because Dr. Bairstow, the organist, exercised a wise control over the programme, and instead of allowing small boys to sing ardent love-ditties, confined their efforts to some Somersetshire folk-songs which were exceedingly enjoyable and much more appropriate.

BRADFORD.

At Bradford the Permanent Orchestra, under Mr. Allen Gill, gave a 'Russian' programme on January 22, Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini,' 'Slavonic March' and 'Sleeping Beauty' Suite, with Glazounow's 'Scènes de Ballet' and the 'Finlandia' of Sibelius representing the Slavonic school. Pierné's Concertstück for harp and orchestra, the solo part admirably played by Miss Stroobants, of the Hallé Orchestra, proved a very enjoyable feature of the concert, and Miss Lucy Nuttall's very artistic singing merits a word of mention. On February 4, at one of the Subscription Concerts, Dr. Richter conducted a really brilliant series of Wagner pieces, the chief being the first act of 'Die Walküre,' with Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Walter Hyde and Mr. Robert Radford as soloists. The Hallé Orchestra was at its best, and the strings had a quite unusual brilliancy. The singing of Miss Elena Gerhardt gave distinction to the concert on February 18, when the Queen's Hall wind quintet had an important share in the programme.

OTHER TOWNS.

At Hull the Symphony Orchestra has been carrying on a most plucky struggle for existence for four seasons, but with so little success that the present one is likely to be the last. It is handicapped by the fact that it consists chiefly of members of local theatre orchestras, so that its concerts must be given in the afternoon, when of course business people cannot attend; and this, together with the departure of Mr. Wallerstein, who has practically made the Orchestra, are the chief reasons why it seems at present impossible to continue the concerts. On February 9 the programme included the 'Unfinished' symphony of Schubert, together with a pleasing suite made up of 'Carmen' music and some of Dvorák's delightful Slavonic dances, and on the 16th, Schumann's B flat Symphony was given as a recognition of his approaching centenary. On January 25 the Hull Vocal Society, of which Dr. G. H. Smith is the conductor, gave a concert, the principal feature of which was unaccompanied part-music sung by the choir.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concert, on February 1, had for its most prominent feature the very artistic playing of Mr. Richard Buhlig, who gave a fine reading of Beethoven's thirty-two Variations, and showed his discrimination in playing several pieces which depended upon higher artistic qualities than technique and endurance for their effect. On February 5, the Huddersfield Philharmonic gave a miscellaneous programme, of which the most remarkable feature was the clever performance by Miss Mildred Langley, a pianist not yet twelve years old, of the solo part in Liszt's 'Hungarian Fantasia' for pianoforte and orchestra. Mr. Arthur Pearson conducted. At the Wakefield Chamber Concert, on January 26, the Brodsky Quartet appeared, and played Beethoven's Quartet in G (Op. 18, No. 2) and Grieg's 'Unfinished' Quartet. The vocalist, Miss Carmen Hill, sang a series of modern songs.

On February 14 the Leeds Symphony Orchestra visited Harrogate, and under the conductorship of Mr. Julian Clifford gave a couple of programmes into which they managed to cram some of the most popular and hackneyed of orchestral pieces, from the 'Pathetic' Symphony to a selection from Gounod's 'Faust' and the Mascagni 'Intermezzo,' which, as might be expected, they played quite admirably, with capital tone and precision. A chamber concert given in York, on January 28, by Mr. John Groves, presented the unusual feature of a string quintet formed by the concert-giver and his sisters, who played with much spirit two movements from Dvorák's Op. 77, while yet another member of the family, Miss Grace Groves, contributed songs.

Foreign Notes.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

Under the conductorship of Professor Schwickerath a carefully prepared first performance of Arnold Mendelssohn's choral work 'Der Paria' was given with great success, in the presence of the composer.

ANTWERP.

Spontini's opera 'La Vestale' has been successfully revived.—At the Symphony Concert on January 30, in the Theatre Royal, a new Serenade for string orchestra and flute by Heinrich Zöllner was successfully produced.

ATHENS.

In spite of the many political troubles now disturbing the country, some interesting works have been heard at the concerts conducted by M. Armand Marsick. The programme of the first of these contained Glazounow's Overture on three Greek themes and Debussy's Prelude 'L'après-midi d'un Faune.' Sgambati's Symphony in D major and the Concertstück by Gabriel Pierné were performed at the second concert.

BERLIN.

The programme of the sixth Symphony Concert of the Königl. Kapelle (conductor, Dr. Richard Strauss) contained Haydn's 'Military' Symphony, Berlioz's Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini,' Brahms's third Symphony, the symphonic waltz 'Olafs Hochzeitsreigen,' by Alexander Ritter, and the Erntefestmusik from Max Schillings' opera 'Moloch.'—The pièce de résistance of the eighth Philharmonic Concert, conducted by Professor Arthur Nikisch, was Anton Bruckner's unfinished ninth Symphony. At the same concert, Frautlein Stefi Geyer gave a fine rendering of the interesting Violin concerto in C minor, by Jaques-Dalcroze.—At the fifth concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (conductor, Herr Oscar Fried), Haydn's Symphony No. 7, 'Le midi,' was performed for the first time in Berlin. On the same occasion Mahler's Nachtmusik from his seventh Symphony, and 'Die Aussöhnung,' a new tone-poem for orchestra and a chorus of tenors, by the well-known pianist Conrad Ansoerge, were produced.—At a concert of the Blüthner Orchestra, Felix Draeseke's 'Symphonia tragica' was played under the conductorship of Herr Joseph Stransky. He also directed the Vorspiel to Paul Ertel's opera 'Gudrun.'—At the fifteenth and last Subscription Concert of the season the Blüthner Orchestra, conducted by Herr Ferdinand Neisser, performed Anton Rubinstein's fifth Symphony for the first time in Berlin. Hugo Kaun's interesting Pianoforte concerto in E flat minor (soloist, Madame Ella Jonas) also figured in the programme.—On January 31 the Philharmonischer Chor, under the musical guidance of Professor Siegfried Ochs, gave the first entire production of Otto Taubmann's 'Eine deutsche Messe' with considerable success. The occasion seems to have been a great artistic event.—The Singakademie performed Sgambati's 'Messa da Requiem' (written in memory of King Humbert I., of Italy) for the first time, the work creating a very favourable impression.—On January 17, Professor Georg Schumann conducted the first performance in Berlin of Friedrich E. Koch's oratorio 'Von den Tageszeiten.'—On January 24, the Bruno Kittelscher Chor performed Gabriel Pierné's 'Kinderkreuzzug' (The children's crusade) for the first time.—The new Violin concerto by Max Schillings was introduced by Herr Felix Berber, the composer himself conducting.—The Pianoforte concerto, Op. 77, by Widor (who himself conducted), was played for the first time by Herr Emil Frey, who also produced a Concerto of his own composition.—Cherubini's rarely heard Trios, Nos. 1 and 2, for female chorus, violin and pianoforte, were given at the concert of the Klara Krause Ladies' Choir.—The Bohemian Quartet played Joseph Suk's String quartet, Op. 11, and the Pianoforte quartet in C minor, Op. 13, by Richard Strauss, at their fourth subscription concert.—An interesting novelty, a String quartet in F sharp minor, by Edgar Stillman-Kelley, figured in the programme of the Waldemar Meyer Quartet.—At their last concert this season the Marteau-Becker Quartet gave an almost ideal rendering of Max Reger's String quartet, Op. 74.—On January 27, the Volkspop gave the first performance in Germany of the opera, 'Cleopatra,' composed by the Danish composer, August Enna, to the libretto of Einar Christiansen. The work proved very effective, and had an excellent reception.

BRESLAU.

On January 21 the Municipal Theatre gave its first performance of Max Schillings' opera 'Ingwelde.'—At the fifth subscription concert of the Orchester Verein (conductor, Dr. Dohrn), Richard Strauss's symphonic phantasy 'Aus Italien,' and Glazounow's Violin concerto in A minor (Op. 82), excellently played by Miss May Harrison, were heard with great interest. Schumann's beautiful choral work 'Paradies und Peri' was excellently performed at the sixth concert, which was given in conjunction with the Breslauer Singakademie.

BRUSSELS.

At the Concerts Populaires a concert performance was given of Monteverde's opera 'Orfeo,' under the baton of M. Sylvain Dupuis. The programme also contained by way of contrast the Prelude and Finale of the first act of Wagner's 'Parsifal.'

COLOGNE.

On January 16 the first performance of August Bungert's tragic opera 'Odysseus Heimkehr' took place with great success at the Municipal Theatre. At the same institution the delightful opera comique 'Johann von Paris' (Jean de Paris), by Boieldieu, was revived.—Two cantatas by Bach, 'Ich hatte viel Bekümmernis' and 'Jesus schläft, was soll ich hoffen?' formed, together with Beethoven's ninth Symphony, the seventh Gürzenich concert. At the eighth concert Herr Fritz Steinbach successfully produced a new work entitled 'Herbstlied,' for six-part chorus and orchestra, by Ernst Rudorff.

COPENHAGEN.

On February 9 the Royal Theatre revived Offenbach's beautiful opera 'Hoffmanns Eventyr' (Les contes d'Hoffmann).—The second concert given by the Dansk Koncert Forening took place on January 27. A new String quartet by F. L. Emborg was produced, and the programme also contained the original Pianoforte quintet by Louis Glass. The Cæcilia Foreningens concert, on February 14, was entirely devoted to compositions by Schumann, to commemorate the coming centenary. Besides the first Symphony in B flat and five of his most beautiful part-songs, the rarely-heard choral work 'Der Rose Pilgerfahrt' was excellently rendered under the conductorship of Herr Frederik Rung.—On February 15, Max Reger made his first appearance in Denmark at a recital given in conjunction with the violinist, Professor Henry Marteau. On this occasion his Sonata in D major and Suite 'im alten Styl' were heard for the first time, and created a favourable impression.

DETMOULD.

On January 9, a lyrical opera in three acts, entitled 'Johanninsnacht,' composed by Edgar Vogel to the libretto of his wife, G. Vogel-Nicolai, was produced, and received very favourably at the Court Theatre.

DRESDEN.

At the Royal Opera House, the pantomime ballet (Tanspantomime) 'Der Schleier der Pierrette,' adapted by Arthur Schnitzler from his renaissance tragedy 'Der Schleier der Beatrice,' and composed by Ernst von Dohnányi, was produced under the auspices of Herr von Schuch, and had a great success. Herr von Dohnányi's music is original.

melodious and cleverly scored.—On January 15 the dialogue 'Der Zwölfjährige Jesus im Tempel,' for chorus (ending in ten parts), soli, string orchestra and organ, by the old German composer Heinrich Schütz, was performed in the Kreuzkirche for the first time.

DÜSSELDORF.

The two-act comic opera 'Robins Ende,' by the young composer Eduard Künneke, was performed at the Municipal Theatre for the first time. The work, which shows considerable talent, had here, as elsewhere, a pronounced success.

GENOA.

On February 3 the four-act opera 'Tzigana,' by Franco Leoni, was produced at the Carlo Felice Theatre.

HAMBURG.

At the Municipal Theatre, on January 25, a three-act opera 'Amore e Perdizione,' composed by His Excellency Señor Joao Arroya, a former Portuguese minister, was produced for the first time in Germany. The work, which contains effective if not very deep music, was well received.

JENA.

At the last Academy concert, an old Symphony in C major, dating from the end of the 18th century, was performed. The Symphony was found in the archives of the Academy Concert Society, and is thought to be an early work by Beethoven, support being lent to this theory by the fact that a violin part is signed Louis van Beethoven. Professor Henry Marteau heard the work, which shows evidence of Beethoven's workmanship as regards modulation and thematic development, and he is of opinion that it is a genuine composition of that master.

KARLSRUHE.

On January 23 the Court Theatre produced, under the musical direction of Herr Leopold Reichwein, the new opera 'Banadietrich,' by Siegfried Wagner, who has also written the libretto. The work is said to show merit, but suffers by inevitable comparison with his father's wonderful creations.

LEIPSIK.

At the Municipal Theatre, Richard Strauss's opera 'Elektra' was performed for the first time, and met with a sensational success. The composer was present, and was accorded a great ovation.—An interesting novelty, the new Symphony in C minor (Op. 85), by Hugo Kaun, was produced under the auspices of Herr Níkisch, at the fourteenth Gewandhaus concert, on January 13. Another novelty, a choral work entitled 'Neues Leben' (after Dante), for solo voices, chorus, orchestra, pianoforte, and organ, by Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari, was presented at the seventeenth concert on February 3.—Granville Bantock's overture, 'The Pierrot of the Minute,' was played for the first time at the eighth Philharmonic concert.—A Festival concert has been given by the Leipziger Männerchor in honour of its conductor, Herr Gustav Wohlgenuth, who celebrates this year his twenty-fifth anniversary as a conductor. In addition to Wagner's 'Das Liebesmahl der Apostel,' Richard Strauss's 'Bardengesang' (poem by Klopstock) and 'Kreuzfahrers Heimfahrt,' by Wilhelm Kienzl, were performed.

LILLE.

At the fourth Concert Populaire, Liszt's oratorio 'La légende de Sainte-Elisabeth' was given for the first time in Lille.

MADRID.

At the Teatro Real, Wagner's 'Götterdämmerung' had its first performance in Madrid, and was received with tremendous enthusiasm.

NICE.

Gabriel Dupont's four-act opera 'La Glu,' libretto by Jean Richepin and Henri Cain, was given for the first time at the Opera House. The work had an excellent reception.

PARIS.

On January 14 the famous tenor M. Jean de Reszke celebrated his sixtieth birthday.—The Opéra Comique recently revived Xavier Leroux's 'Reine Fiammette,' with considerable success.—Offenbach's beautiful operetta 'La Chanson de Fortunio' has been performed at the Trianon-Lyrique, after a rest of nearly forty years.—The Société J. S. Bach has performed the master's 'Christmas Oratorio' for the first time in Paris, and on February 11 presented the great B minor Mass.—Many interesting orchestral works have been heard at the leading Symphony concerts. The Société des Concerts Conservatoire gave a performance of the late Paul Dukas's Symphony in C major, on February 5. Richard Strauss's 'Sinfonia domestica' figured on the programme of the Colonne Concerts on January 16, and the same composer's tone-poem 'Also sprach Zarathustra' was given on January 23, at the Concert Lamoureux. On the latter occasion Widor's beautiful Chorale and Variations for harp and orchestra were played by Mlle. Henriette Renié. On February 13, Schumann's 'Manfred' was performed at the Colonne Concerts. The part of Manfred was taken by the famous tragic actor from the Théâtre Français, M. Mounet-Sully.

PRAGUE.

To commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the death of Frederick Smetana, his three symphonic poems, 'Richard III.,' 'Hakon Jarl' and 'Wallensteins Lager,' were performed at a concert conducted by M. Kovarovic.

ROME.

The name of Leoncavallo has been much to the fore lately. At the Costanzi Theatre his new opera, 'Maia,' was brought out on January 16 under the musical direction of Signor Mascagni, but it did not come up to expectations. A few days later the Theatre Nazionale produced another new work by him, an operetta in three acts entitled 'Malbruk,' which, on the other hand, achieved a genuine success.

The final competition for free open scholarships at the Royal College of Music took place on February 17. The following are the names of the successful candidates:—Composition—Elliot R. Thompson, Moseley. Pianoforte—Norah M. Cordwell, London; Muriel E. Berry, London; Kathleen I. Long, Bury St. Edmunds. Singing—Alice G. Gear, Bristol; Lilian J. Burgess, Birmingham; Thomas G. Walters, Swansea; William H. Green, Doncaster. Organ—Reginald J. Foort, London; Douglas G. A. Fox, Clifton College, Clifton. Violin—Samuel Nagley, Goole; Francis P. Warren, Leamington; Edward S. de Groot, London; Dora Garland, St. Leonard's-on-Sea. Violoncello—Helen I. F. Beeching, London. Double-Bass—James W. Merrett, Glasgow. Harp—Catharine M. Johnson, Thetford. Flute—Arthur Hedges, Maidenhead. Hautboy—Harold G. Foreman, London. Trumpet—Alexander Hall, Liverpool. The Pauer Memorial Exhibition (£7 10s.) for the student of at least one year's standing in the College who attains the highest position among the proxime of the pianoforte, was awarded to Gladys M. Cawston, of Cambridge.

The usual concerts of sacred music will be held on Good Friday, at the Crystal Palace. In the afternoon Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' will be given, and the artists include Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Edna Thornton, Madame Clara Butt, Mr. Charles Saunders, Mr. Kennerley Rumford and Sir Charles Santley. There will also be a miscellaneous second part, and the London Symphony Orchestra will assist. At the evening concert, Miss Ethel Wood and Mr. Herbert Heyner will sing, and the full Band of the Coldstream Guards will play, conducted by Lieut. Dr. J. Mackenzie Rogan. Mr. Fred Holloway will be at the organ for both concerts and Mr. A. Fox at the pianoforte. The whole of the arrangements will be under the supervision of Mr. Walter Hedgcock.

At Trinity College of Music, London, the Maybrick Prize for Ballad Singing (five guineas) has been awarded to Eveline Matthews. The examiners were: Messrs. G. E. Bambridge, Herman Klein, C. W. Pearce, and Mrs. Helen Trust. The following Scholarships and Free Tuition have been awarded for one year, with possible renewal: Organ: Herbert Dawson. Pianoforte: Edgar S. Mitchell, Briana Prager, Ruth A. Strickland; Free tuition: Jenny S. Russell. Violin: Olga Corrigan, Hazel B. Giles, Constance E. Martin. Singing: Eric R. Cooper, Mabel E. Hardy, Eva K. Sly, Robert A. Strong; Free tuition: Stanley J. Evans, Leonard Van Mentz. Violoncello (Free tuition): Kathleen Thompson. Flute (Free tuition): Harry Gardner.

A performance of Milton's 'Masque of Comus' was given on February 14, at the Lyceum Club, Piccadilly. Selections from the poem were recited by Mrs. Calverley Bewicke, and Lawes's original settings to the five songs were sung by Miss Oswyn Jones and Mr. Graham Smart. An introductory lecture was delivered by Mr. E. Stanley Roper, B.A., and the whole performance was much appreciated by a distinguished audience, which included many notable persons in the literary world. The incidental music was played by the Lyceum String Quintet, under the direction of Mr. Roper.

One of the most attractive of this winter's theatrical entertainments has been the presentation at the Haymarket Theatre of Maeterlinck's charming fairy play, 'The Blue Bird.' Not a little of the popularity of the performance must be attributed to the fanciful and felicitous incidental music composed for the occasion by Mr. Norman O'Neill. He seems to have thoroughly assimilated the poetry and whimsicality of the play, and his workmanship displays agreeable facility of technique and much refinement.

Madame Amina Goodwin, an ardent Schumannite, who studied the longest under Clara Schumann, will include among the London Trio concerts this season a 'Schumann Centenary Chamber Concert' at Æolian Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, June 8 (the composer's birthday). Amina Goodwin, Simonetti, and Whitehouse will take part in some of Schumann's most famous chamber-music works.

Among recent additions to the staff of the Toronto Conservatory of Music are Mr. G. Bruce, violoncellist, and Miss Josephine Scruby, teacher of voice-production and singing, with credentials from London (Royal Academy of Music) and also from Paris.

Mr. Ivor Atkins, the organist of Worcester Cathedral, has been elected an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABBEY CWM IIR (Radnorshire).—The Choral Society terminated its ninth season on February 8 and 10, when Gounod's 'Gallia' and Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus' were performed. The choir of forty voices sang well, and the accompaniments were played by pianoforte, organ and string quartet. The solos were sung by Miss Moore and members of the Society. Mr. H. P. Jones conducted. The Society is doing good work in a remote country district.

AMERSHAM.—The Choral Society gave a performance of Gaul's 'Joan of Arc' in the Town Hall on February 4. The choir sang with much expression and intelligence. Miss Dorothy Webb, Mr. Ernest Penfold and the Rev. C. E. Briggs were the solo vocalists. There was a small orchestra, with Miss Matthews at the pianoforte, and Mr. Edward G. Croager conducted.

ASHFORD.—The Choral Society performed Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' on Thursday, February 3, under the conductorship of Mr. Fletcher. The choir was well balanced and sang with admirable intelligence and expression throughout, but the orchestra was not altogether equal to the demands made upon it. The solo vocalists were Miss Joan Dalrymple, Miss Florence Giles, Mr. Webster Millar, Mr. F. Read and Mr. Harry Burnage, the latter being particularly good in the part of Lucifer.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—Mr. Albert Fairbairn gave a concert in the Town Hall on January 25, when the chief features of the programme were Féliçien David's 'The Desert' and the overtures, 'Leonora' No. 3, and Nicolai's 'Merry Wives of Windsor', in both of which the orchestra was heard to advantage. Good work was also done by the choir in 'The Desert,' the tenor solos in which were sung by Mr. Henry Turpenney and the verses spoken by Mr. S. Hamer. Madame Lucie Gillespie was the other vocalist.

BARNET.—Miss Emily Macfarlane gave her fourth annual concert at the Ewen Hall on February 3. The ladies' choir sang several part-songs with admirable taste and expression, being especially good in an arrangement of 'Annie Laurie' by Mr. Charles Macpherson. The string orchestra also displayed the results of good training, notably in Bach's B minor Suite for strings and flute (Miss Edith Penville). Vocal solos were contributed by Miss Marie Brema, Mr. Percy Watson, and the concert-giver. Mr. Charles Macpherson conducted.

BEDFORD.—The Musical Society's second concert this season took place in the Corn Exchange, on Tuesday, February 8, under the conductorship of Dr. H. A. Harding. The programme included Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, Liszt's 'Hungarian Rhapsody,' Dr. Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody, Sibelius's valse-triste 'Kuolema,' and 'Songs of the sea' (with male chorus) and Irish Rhapsody No. 1, by Sir C. V. Stanford, the last two conducted by the composer. The choir and orchestra numbered 250 performers, and the principal soloists were Miss Viola Salvin, Mr. G. H. Thomas and Mr. Plunket Greene.

BOGNOR.—'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' was the main feature in the concert given by the Musical Society at the Assembly Rooms on February 2. The tenor solo was sung by Mr. Henry Beaumont, and the choir did very good work, receiving efficient support from a small orchestra. The performance was conducted by Mr. F. J. W. Crowe. Miss Beatrice Overton was the other vocalist, and Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, the solo part by Miss M. Hirschfeld, was included in the programme.

BOURNEMOUTH.—The Orpheus Glee Society, which was organized in November, gave its first concert at Holy Trinity Hall on February 8. The programme included Mendelssohn's 'Vintage Song'; Hatton's 'When evening's twilight'; 'Comrades in arms,' Adolphe Adam; 'As the moments roll,' Webbe; 'Must I then part from thee,' Otto; 'Soldier's love,' Kücken, and Sullivan's 'The long day closes.' These were excellently sung under the direction of Mr. Herbert J. Nash, who may be congratulated on his careful training of the choir.—Madame Newling's Choir gave a concert at the Winter Gardens on February 15, when Brahms's 'A song of destiny' and C. V. Stanford's 'The Revenge' were performed. The choir was hardly at its best, evident signs of the need of further rehearsal being apparent. Mr. Dan Godfrey conducted, and obtained good results from his capital orchestra. Miss Marie Cooper and Mr. Frank Dickinson were the solo vocalists. The orchestra played Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' Fest Marsch and Introduction to Act III., 'Lohengrin,' Tchaikovsky's '1812' Overture, Sibelius's 'Valse-triste,' and Järnfeldt's 'Praeludium' with excellent effect.

BRAINTREE.—The Baintree and Bocking Institute Choral Society, conducted by Mr. James Newman, gave its annual concert on February 8, at the Institute, when Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's departure' was performed. The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Lund, Mr. H. Sadleur Brown and Mr. Greeves Johnson. The second part of the programme included Mendelssohn's overture 'Fingal's Cave,' by the orchestra, led by Mr. G. H. Wilby, and Pinsuti's 'Spring Song' by the choir.

CALNE.—The Musical Society's annual concert took place at the Town Hall, on February 8. The programme consisted mainly of Novello's concert selection from 'Faust.' The principal parts were sung by Madame Sods, Miss Brotherhood, Mr. Lionel Venn and Mr. F. H. Fogg. The band and choir were under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Pulletin.

CARLISLE.—Elgar's 'King Olaf' was performed for the first time in this city, at the Drill Hall, on January 27. The choir and orchestra, including fifteen members of the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, and numbering 200 performers, gave on the whole an excellent rendering of the work under the direction of Mr. W. C. Darley. The principal vocalists were Miss Ward, Mr. Henry Brearley and Mr. Joseph Lycett. The programme included Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, Elgar's 'From the Bavarian Highlands' (No. 1), and harp solos by Miss Florence Walton.

CHESTERFIELD.—The Chesterfield and District Musical Union gave a very excellent performance of 'Elijah' in the Stephenson Memorial Hall on February 16, under the able conductorship of Mr. J. Frederic Staton, whose ability in training the choir was fully evidenced. Able assistance was rendered by the orchestra, and the principal solo vocalists were Miss Winifred Marwood, Miss Ethel Parr, Mr. Fred Fallas and Mr. Charles Tree, who as usual gave a very artistic rendering of the title-rôle.

CHIPPENHAM.—The Choral Society's concert on February 2 included Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' and Gounod's 'Faust' (concert edition). The soloists were Madame Sands, Miss Brotherhood, Mr. G. D. Armour and Mr. F. H. Fogg. The choruses were rendered with vigour and expression, indicating careful training. Mr. W. R. Pullein conducted.

CHRISTCHURCH (N.Z.).—The Musical Union gave a successful performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' on December 21. The choir sang well throughout, and the orchestra, led by Miss Packer, played the overture and accompaniments very efficiently. The principal solo vocalists were Mrs. Gower Burns, Mrs. Pidgeon, Mr. Robertson-Suggars and Mr. John Prowse, the last named being an excellent representative of the Prophet. Dr. Bradshaw conducted.

COLERAINE.—The Orchestral Society's annual concert took place in the Town Hall on January 27. The programme included the Overture 'Le Domino Noir,' the Minuet from Handel's 'Samson,' Sullivan's 'Graceful Dance,' and Mendelssohn's 'Wedding March.' Solos for the violin and violoncello were contributed by Miss Muriel Porter and Miss Ethel Porter, and the vocalists were Miss Muriel Johnstone and Mr. James Briggs. Miss Macey was the accompanist, and Mr. W. Mallinson conducted.

DARTFORD.—The Dartford and District Choral and Orchestral Society gave an excellent performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' at the Victoria Hall, on February 2, under the direction of Mr. David Mackenzie. Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony was well played by the orchestra, and the choir sang well in Pearsall's 'When Allen-a-Dale went a-hunting' and the conductor's 'Newquay fisherman's song.'

EAST GRINSTEAD.—The Choral Society finished its fifteenth season on February 2, with a performance of Stanford's 'Revenge' and a miscellaneous programme including a choral fantasia on 'Tannhäuser,' by Percy Fletcher, the baritone solos in which were sung by Mr. Graham Smart. The choir and orchestra, numbering eighty performers, were under the conductorship of Mr. Walter Crapps.

FARNHAM.—The Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Percy R. Rowe, gave a concert on January 25. The chief works performed were Cunningham Woods' cantata 'King Harold'; Hamish MacCunn's 'Wreck of the Hesperus'; Grieg's male-voice choral song 'Recognition of land,' and the march and chorus from 'Tannhäuser.' The choir gave indications of careful preparation, and the amateur orchestra also proved efficient. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Montgomery, Mr. McConnochie and Mr. Gale Gardner, and Mr. Charles A. Souper contributed a flute solo with much success.

FAVERSHAM.—The Faversham Institute Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Trilogy on Hiawatha,' in the Lecture Hall, on February 3. Much credit is due to the conductor, Mr. W. J. Keech, for the general excellence of the performance by both choir and orchestra (led by Mr. E. G. Cox), and the work met with a very favourable reception. The solo parts were ably sung by Miss Ethel Wilkinson, Mr. Frank Webster and Mr. Robert Grice.

FORFAR.—Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' was performed on February 17, by the Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Herr Gottlieb Feuerberg. The choir sang throughout with admirable spirit and effect, and were assisted by an efficient orchestra led by Mr. Daebnitz. The solo vocalists were Miss Janet Burt, Mr. Henry Brearley and Mr. Charlesworth.

GIRVAN.—The Choral Society gave a performance of Cunningham Woods' cantata 'King Harold,' on February 11, under the conductorship of Mr. John Macgattagart. The choir of ninety voices sang with credit to themselves and their conductor. Efficient service was rendered by the orchestra, consisting of twenty-eight members of the Western Amateur Orchestral Society, who were also heard with effect in the first movement of Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, and Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture. The choir also sang Piniati's 'The sea hath its pearls,' 'The hour of rest' (Mendelssohn) and 'Wi' a hundred pipers.' The solo vocalists were Miss Maud Chandler and Mr. John Jameson.

INVERCARGILL (N.Z.).—The Musical Union, assisted by members of several other, local choirs, gave a notable performance of the 'Messiah' on December 17, in the Municipal Theatre, under the direction of Mr. C. Gray, to whom much credit is due for the generally excellent rendering. The choral singing was unusually good, and the orchestra, led by Mr. C. Ferguson, gave efficient assistance. The solo vocalists were Miss Richards, Miss V. McIntosh, Mr. Cookson, and Mr. J. E. Taylor.

KINETO.—The annual concert of the Choral Society took place on February 2, when Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Cradle of Christ' was performed. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Montgomery and Mr. G. F. Cale-Matthews. The choir, numbering fifty, gave a good interpretation of the music, and the band was led by Mr. H. A. Heden. The second part included Elgar's 'Sursum Corda,' by the orchestra, and the choir gave a spirited rendering of Bridge's 'Bold Turpin.' Miss Phyllis Motion contributed a violoncello solo. Mr. G. W. Webb conducted.

LICHFIELD.—The Musical Society gave its annual concert on January 25, when Hodson's cantata 'The Golden Legend' was performed, under the direction of Mr. J. B. Lott, the Cathedral organist, with signal success. The cantata is very dramatic and abounds in melodious numbers. The band and choir numbered 140 performers, and the principal vocalists were Madame Le Mar, Miss Hodgson, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Herbert Parker.

LUTON.—The Choral Society gave a concert in Plait Hall on February 2, under the conductorship of Mr. Frederick Gostelow. The programme included Hubert Bath's cantata 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny.' These works were successfully performed by the choir and orchestra, the latter being also heard in Tchaikovsky's '1812' Overture, and Nicolai's overture to the 'Merry Wives of Windsor.' The solo vocalists were Miss Carrie Lanceby and Mr. Thorpe Bates, and some excellent viola solos were given by Miss Phyllis Mitchell.

MADELEY.—Handel's 'Jephtha,' with Sullivan's additional accompaniments, was admirably performed by the Choral Society in the Anstice Memorial Institute on February 7. The feature of these concerts is the excellent singing of the choir, and its reputation was fully maintained on this occasion. An excellent band selected from the Birmingham Festival and Symphony Orchestras, led by Mr. H. Freeman, ably supplied the accompaniments, and the solo vocalists were Miss Maude Phillips, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. James Davies and Mr. James Coleman.

MANSFIELD WOODHAM.—The New Choral Society, formed at the commencement of the present winter, gave its first concert in the Turner Memorial Hall on February 7. The inaugural programme, which included Macfarren's 'May-day' as its chief feature, gave fair promise for the future, the choir being well balanced and showing evidence of the careful training of their conductor, Mr. S. H. Dutton.

NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME.—The Male-Voice Choir gave its annual concert in the Municipal Hall, on January 27. The principal item in the programme was Hegar's 'Phantom Host,' which created a sensation at one of the Morecambe festivals. This was encored. Other interesting part-songs by Sibelius, MacDowell, &c., were given, and two new part-songs were heard for the first time—'Thou' scarlet leaf is falling,' by F. A. Challinor, and 'Sigh no more, ladies,' by S. E. Lovatt, the conductor of the Society. The latter item was encored. Relief was afforded by vocal items from Miss Edith Clegg and Mr. Charles Saunders. Mr. William Henley contributed some violin solos, and Mr. E. Hammond was the accompanist.

NEWPORT PAGNELL.—The Newport Pagnell and District Choral Society's first concert this season took place on January 27 at the Town Hall, when Handel's 'Samson' was performed. The solo vocalists were Miss Jessie Hudson, Miss Heath, Mr. G. F. Nidd and Mr. S. Heath. Much credit is due to both choir and orchestra for their finished work under the conductorship of Mr. C. Kenneth Garratt.

PORTH.—The Cymmer Choral Society gave performances of Elgar's 'King Olaf' on January 27 and 29 in the Cymmer Old Chapel, which has recently been renovated. The work received a remarkably good interpretation by the choir and orchestra, reflecting much credit on Mr. Joseph Bowen, the conductor. A very capable trio of vocalists was secured in Madame Mills-Reynolds, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

READING.—Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was performed by the Free Church Choral Society in the Town Hall, on February 2. The choir gave evidence of excellent training, and the orchestra was efficient. Miss Emily Breare, Miss Adelaide Rind, Mr. Gwilym Richards and Mr. Charles Knowles, an excellent Lucifer, were the solo vocalists, and Mr. A. W. Moss, the conductor, had his choral and orchestral forces well under control.

SCUNTHORPE.—The Choral Society gave a successful performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' in the Geisha Skating Rink on February 3. Great pains had evidently been taken both by the choir and orchestra, and much credit is due to the conductor, Mr. F. C. Nicholson, for the general excellence of the performance. A remarkably able trio of solo vocalists was provided in Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Watkin Mills.

STOURPORT.—The annual concert of the Church Choral Society was held in the Parish Room on February 2, when Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' was performed. The choir, under the conductorship of Mr. George Jackson, sang with much spirit and intelligence, and received able assistance from the orchestra. The solo vocalists were Miss Moya Herdman, Mr. T. Gordon James, and Mr. Sidney Stoddard.

TAUNTON.—The Madrigal Society gave its annual Ladies' Night as usual on Shrove Tuesday, February 8, when madrigals and part-songs by Orlando di Lasso, Thomas Morley, John Bennett, Schumann, Pearsall, G. A. Macfarren, J. E. Lovatt, Dudley Buck, and a madrigal 'In praise of fair music,' by the conductor, Mr. Harold A. Jeboult, formed the chief part of the programme. The vocalist was Miss Esta d'Argo, and three finely executed violin solos were contributed by Miss Katie Parker. The accompaniments were well-played by Miss Helen Barling.

THIRSK.—The annual concert by the Choral Society took place in the new Wesleyan School Room, on February 8, when Mackenzie's cantata 'Jason' was performed. The choir of about sixty voices displayed good tone and attack and gave evidence of good training by their conductor, Mr. A. J. Todd, organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church. Valuable assistance was rendered by the Harrogate Amateur Orchestral Society, and the solo vocalists were Miss Alice Hayes, Mr. Wilfred Hudson and Mr. John Browning.

TREHARRIS.—The first Oratorio concert of the Choral Society (which was organized in the autumn of last year) took place in the Public Hall on February 3, when Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was performed. The choir was well balanced and displayed excellent tone and expression, reflecting much credit on Mr. W. J. R. Davis, who conducted, and efficient support was given by the orchestra, led by Mr. Ben George. The principal vocalists were Madame Gunter Williams, Miss May Richards, Mr. Sam Hempshall, and Mr. David Hughes.

VALETTA.—A concert was given by the Malta Musical Union in the Military Gymnasium on February 10, in aid of the St. John's Ambulance Association, under the conductorship of Mr. W. S. Robinson, when the programme included Stanford's 'Revenge,' Eaton Faning's 'Miller's wooing,' and 'Moonlight,' John E. West's, 'Love and Summer,' 'The dawning day' (Reay), and 'Behold the woods' (Mendelssohn), by the choir, and the orchestra played Valse-triste—Kuolema' (Sibelius), German's 'Henry VIII.' Dances, and the Finale from Haydn's E flat Symphony. The solo vocalists were Miss Rushbrook, Messrs. W. A. Lloyd, Salmond and Liddell.

WATLINGTON (Oxon.).—The Ladies' Choral Society gave its annual concert on January 28 in the Lecture Hall. The programme included 'Over hill, over dale,' C. H. Lloyd, Vaughan Williams's 'Sound sleep' and 'Make haste, O man, to live,' Lee-Williams. A most intelligent reading was given of these part-songs by the choir, reflecting much credit on its trainer, Dr. Storer, who accompanied throughout the concert.

WHITSTABLE.—The Philharmonic Society's annual concert took place on February 2, when Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' was performed by a choir and orchestra of 80 performers. The programme included Wagner's choral march 'Hail, bright abode.' Miss May Peters and Mr. Frank Webster were the solo vocalists, and Mr. Ernest G. Cox conducted.

Answers to Correspondents.

SOUTH KENSINGTON.—Max Bruch's 'Zweite Symphonie' in F moll, Op. 36, is published as a pianoforte duet. It can be obtained from Novello & Co., price 8s. net. Among numerous existing studies for the left-hand alone we mention the following:—Zoseffy Gavotte (Bach); Chant des vagues (Köhler); Three Pieces (Spindler); Three Studies after Bach (Philipp); Four Studies (Max Reger); Studies (2 books) (Reinberger).

D.—The dates of the death of the persons you name are as follows:—Rev. H. R. Haweis, 1901; Rev. Newman Hall, 1902; J. H. Farmer (Harrow), 1901; Miss Jane Borthwick, 1897. Mr. W. Amps and Mr. Samuel Smith are still living.

PERPLEXED.—The edition of Handel's Gigue of Suite I., by Krüger, of Stuttgart Conservatorium, is a good one. It gives as much instruction as to manner of performance as can be made clear apart from a teacher. We do not think we can add to its suggestions with advantage.

CHORAL.—Much information regarding the formation of choral societies will be found in 'The Choral Society,' by L. C. Venables, published by J. Curwen & Sons.

CELLO.—There are many male altos with purely natural voices. We hesitate to give names of three, because of the invidiousness of the task.

R. C.—Accent on the first syllable of 'chastisement.'

Many other answers are unavoidably held over.

TECHNIQUE

EXPRESSION

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

SIX OCTAVE STUDIES FOR THE PIANOFORTE

BY

WILLEM COENEN.

"The musical value of some of the pieces is not inconsiderable."—The Times.

"Must needs prove most useful, and are not at all dry."—Daily Telegraph.

"The studies are quite as entertaining to the listener as they are serviceable to the performer."—Musical Opinion.

"Six clever and useful 'Octave Studies.' They are more than usually interesting."—Musical Standard.

"Excellent for practice."—Christian World.

"They afford a very complete course of study. The different numbers are tuneful and attractive, and the variety is great."—The Lady.

"Almost every branch of octave-playing is represented in these tuneful studies."—Church Bells.

"These studies are very melodious, and will make the irksome study of octaves quite interesting to the hard-working student."—Church Family Newspaper.

"Admirably adapted to formulate touch as well as style in this special branch of pianoforte technique."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"Fitted for advanced students. For wrist work, No. 2 is excellent, and No. 6 is good enough for a concert piece. In all there is pretty equal work for both hands."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"Six excellent octave studies (legato and staccato)."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

"Can safely be recommended to players who possess the laudable ambition of keeping up their technique."—Western Daily Press.

THE MUSICAL EDUCATOR.

A LIBRARY OF INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC
WRITTEN BY EXPERTS.

FIRST PAYMENT, 1s. 6d.

The aim of "The Musical Educator" is to supply in compact and interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

MARK HAMBOURG, "The Piano and how to Play it."

EDWIN H. LEMARE, "The Art of Organ Playing."

MADAME MARCHESI, "The Teaching of Singing."

JOHN DUNN, "On Playing the Violin."

DR. F. H. COWEN, "The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In the "Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that the "Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

"The 'Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRISER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

TE DEUM IN C

BY

THE REV. J. H. SHACKLETON BAILEY, M.A.

Price Threepence.

This Te Deum is admirably adapted for choirs of limited resources. The author's aim has been to produce a melodious and simple setting in four parts.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

TWENTY-FIRST AND TWENTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF
LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings; the same effective, grateful past-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.
Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

The loan of Parts for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombones or Euphonium, and Kettledrums, may be had on application to the COMPOSER, Giltott Lodge, Edgbaston.

SECOND EDITION. THIRD TO FIFTH THOUSAND.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA
FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.
THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE
AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"It is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthy the study of choral societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.
"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pontypool Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.
Tonic Sol-fa, for the Use of Choral Societies, each, 1s.
Vocal Sol-fa Edition, 1s. Words only, 5s. per 100.
Band Parts (the loan of) on application to the COMPOSER, Giltott Lodge, Edgbaston.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

* U N A

EIGHTH AND NINTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL,
OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"Una is quite one of his best."—Musical Standard.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

* THE TEN VIRGINS

SEVENTEENTH AND EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

* JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Thirty-sixth to Fortieth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

EIGHTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

† ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

This edition of Merbecke's Communion Service is based on Rimbault's reprint of 1871, after a careful comparison with a copy of the original edition of 1550 belonging to the Library of Christ Church, Oxford. The Plain Song is presented as nearly as possible in the form in which it first appeared, only such changes having been introduced as are required by the altered wording of our Prayer Book.

ENDYMION'S DREAM

CANTATA

FOR SOPRANO AND TENOR SOLI, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS BY

C. R. B. BARRETT

THE MUSIC BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A short cantata, this, which occupies little more than half-an-hour in performance, it is likely to become popular on account of the pleasant nature of its music, even though a good deal more use might be, and perhaps should have been, made of the chorus. But not since, in his student days, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor evolved the opening part of his "Hiawatha" trilogy, has he composed music that seemed so grateful and so inevitable. . . . There are in the score many pages in which the composer's own individuality appears unmistakably, and his is a decidedly interesting individuality. This, combined with the picturesqueness of the music, the dramatic nature of the "book," and the comparative freedom of the score from ultra-modern difficulties, should enable the cantata to find many a hearing, more especially in choirs and places where the pitch is not so high as in use at Brighton.

MORNING POST.

His music shows no decrease in choral effect, and this remains the composer's strong point and the outstanding feature of the work. . . . Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is to be commended for his appreciation of the design best suited to the theme of the union of Sun and Moon. His eloquence of musical utterance, his command of orchestral colour, and his grasp of fundamental principles of choral writing are present throughout.

STANDARD.

Seldom has so much urgent music—music that breathes and reeks of romance and passion in almost every bar—been compressed into so small a compass. At a time when the future of English opera is upon every one's lips it is encouraging to meet with a work that reveals a sense of the theatre so unmistakably as does Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's so-called cantata. The composer employs the representative theme, but he employs it with discretion, and the orchestral writing throughout is both free and unfettered. Notwithstanding that the passion is nothing if not cumulative, the skill with which he avoids an anti-climax is remarkable. A delightfully atmospheric chorus of star-cantellations—founded on a descending chromatic figure, leads to Selene's solo, which contains some of the most beautiful music in the work; indeed, throughout the vocal writing is of an unusually grateful nature. Moreover, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's stock of orchestral device and colour is unfailing.

OBSERVER.

It is the most vital work he has written for a long time. He has not since his early days so well resisted the temptation to set down superfluous things just because they come easily to him, and this is only another way of saying that it is conciser and better balanced than anything he has composed for a long time. It also shows a finer sense of climax and of dramatic music as distinct from that which is merely superficially picturesque.

ATHENEUM.

WORLD.

Coleridge-Taylor's "Dream of Endymion" is likely to rank as his best work since "Hiawatha," for it is stronger and terser, and gives proof of greater intellectuality without loss of the qualities of sensuous charm which always distinguishes Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, even when he is least his best self.

THE CHOIRBOY'S GUIDE TO THE CATHEDRAL PSALTER

EDITED AND ARRANGED BY

ERNEST NEWTON.

This little book has been compiled mainly for the use of choirboys, and, therefore, nothing has been inserted but what is absolutely necessary for understanding the pointing of the Psalms as arranged in the Cathedral Psalter.

A certain amount of information has been given for the guidance of the Choirmaster, but the principal part of the book consists in the sets of exercises which have been arranged to lead the choirboys, step by step, through the various divisions of syllables that occur in the chanting of the Psalms.

After careful examination of the Cathedral Psalter, it has been found that there are exactly fifteen ways of dividing these syllables.

As the Recitation Notes are well within the compass of Alto, Tenor, and Bass voices, the book can be used with equal advantage by all members of a choir.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE BACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

EXTRACTS FROM PREFACE.

My guiding principle has been to place before the reader the facts collected by me as well as the conclusions at which I arrived. This will enable him to see the subject in all its bearings, with all its pros and cons, and to draw his own conclusions, should mine not obtain his approval.

My researches had for their object the whole life of Chopin and his historical, political, artistic, social, and personal surroundings, but they were chiefly directed to the least known and most interesting period of his career—his life in France, and his visits to Germany and Great Britain.

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

1A. TECHNICAL PRACTICE (1st Position)	2s. od.	1B. STUDIES (1st Position)	2s. od.
2A. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. od.	2B. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.

Sir Frederick Bridge and Pianoforte Sight-Playing.

Sir Frederick Bridge recently deplored the general lack of efficiency in Sight-Playing, remarking that he had never been able to give full marks for this subject at examinations, even though the pieces selected for the Sight-Reading tests were far below the standard of difficulty of those selected for performance.

This inability to play music at sight is the great stumbling-block with nearly all students, and my system is the result of the first attempt to deal with this difficulty upon definite and scientific lines. By its aid a student is enabled to play at first sight any piece within his or her technical abilities after three months of about 15 minutes' daily practice.

Booklet, containing a full explanation of the methods employed, sent gratis and post-free to any pianist, on application to

ANTONIO STRADIVARI

HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well-qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice." The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

IN AN EMERGENCY, WORKS DONE AT SIGHT.

"Mr. Sadleur Browne's sweet and beautiful rendering of the solo 'Onaway, awake, beloved,' was the success of the evening; in the second part he sang 'My Dreams' (Tosti), his cultured style gaining him a tremendous reception, in response to which he gave with great tenderness and feeling the old ballad 'Mary of Argyle.'"—The Argus, Newport, Mon.

"The rendering of 'If with all your hearts' was an exceedingly fine performance, the vocalist throwing an intensity of pathos and expression into the interpretation of the air which demonstrated that he is a singer of great taste and finish."—Survey Times.

"THE SEASONS."—"The Cavatina, 'Distressful nature fairly sinks,' stood out in bold relief as the most delicate piece of solo-singing in the whole concert, and won him a well-merited encore. In the air, 'The traveller stands perplex'd,' he was likewise altogether admirable."—Hampshire Advertiser.

"This short air ('Behold and see if there be any sorrow'), as rendered by Mr. Sadleur Browne, is settled in my mind as an example of sacred expression unique in its elevation and intensity. The accent of pathos could scarcely go farther than in the above."—Western Daily News.

MR.

CHARLESWORTH GEORGE

(BASS-BARITONE).

MORNING POST.

A baritone voice of considerable resonance and useful quality.

STANDARD.

A bass-baritone of a fine resonant quality throughout.

YORKSHIRE OBSERVER.

An exceptionally good voice of considerable range and ringing qualities.

The following is a letter from Mr. H. Chilver-Wilson, who was the teacher of Mr. Herbert Brown:

Mayfield, Woodgrave Avenue, Ealing, W.

"I can with the utmost confidence recommend Mr. Charlesworth George as a bass-baritone vocalist. He has a really fine voice, with the exceptional compass from the low bass C to the high baritone G (two octaves and a fifth), even and powerful throughout.

"In addition he has decided temperament, and his future promises to be brilliant.

"He has studied with me long and earnestly, and is enthusiastic in his work.

(Signed) "H. CHILVER-WILSON

(Associate of the Philharmonic Society of London)."

ROBIN OVERLEIGH

(BASS-BARITONE).

"ELIJAH" (Weybridge, April 26).—"The performance was specially noteworthy for the fine interpretation of the outstanding rôle by Mr. Robin Overleigh. This singer ranged up and down the entire gamut of the emotions. He was in turn supplicating, dramatic, derisive, passionate, declamatory, despairing, serene. His voice accommodated itself to every mood, and its fine timbre responded readily to each new demand.

THE MALKIN
PATENT PEDAL ATTACHMENT

All Organists should write for particulars of above attachment. It is the latest invention, most up-to-date, the simplest, best and cheapest attachment on the market, absolutely noiseless, is easily fixed by any amateur, and will not injure the most delicate pianoforte.

OUR NEW AND EXCLUSIVE OCTAVE ATTACHMENT is the Greatest Advance in Pedal Attachments since their introduction.

The following testimonial is one of many—

DEAR SIR, Brampton, Cumberland.

October 6, 1909.

After an exhaustive examination and trial of your attachment, I am well satisfied that it is the best on the market for simplicity and durability, noiseless and perfect repetition, and non-injurious to any piano. It cannot be beaten, and the moderate price should guarantee a large sale.

Yours faithfully,
F. DIGGLE, Mus. Bac., A.R.C.O.

LANDON RONALD.

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

APRIL 1, 1910.

LONDON RONALD.

An exhaustive inquiry into the making of a great conductor would be one of the most interesting of studies in musical evolution. We are often told that conductors are born, not made. The positive side of this statement is beyond dispute, but its negative side may be seriously questioned. It is true that certain inborn faculties of a somewhat rare kind are indispensable preliminaries, but even if these faculties are possessed in a striking degree, there are many qualities to be added which can be obtained only in the stern and bitter school of experience. Every eminent conductor has had to climb more or less laboriously up many steps of the evolutionary ladder before eminence was attained. This discipline is best acquired in comparative obscurity, before its results are exhibited in the fierce light that beats about the conductor's throne on great occasions. The story of the early mistakes and struggles of prominent conductors would make an entertaining chapter, and would be useful and encouraging to neophytes. It is probably mainly because it is impossible to do more than furnish students with elementary equipment that the Colleges and Academies do so little for the art of conducting, and until lately the chances of gaining experience on a large scale were lamentably small. But now the outlook has expanded, and it is gratifying to observe that there have grown up in our midst many capable men who can deal adequately with the most complicated and advanced orchestral and choral music. One of the most recent to come to the front is the musician whose name heads this article. We feel sure that our readers will welcome a sketch of his career.

Landon Ronald was born in London on 7, 1873. His early education was obtained at Marylebone and All Souls' Grammar School, and this was followed by a period spent at the High School, Margate, better known under its later title of Margate College. In 1884 he entered the Royal College of Music, where he studied for some five years with Mr. Franklin Taylor (pianoforte); Mr. Henry Holmes (violin); Sir Hubert Parry (composition); Sir Frederick Bridge (counterpoint); and he also had various lessons from Sir Charles Stanford and Sir Walter Parratt. At the age of sixteen and a-half he left the Royal College and, in 1890, made his début as a solo pianist in the famous musical play without words, 'L'Enfant Prodiges.' But a rôle as virtuoso pianist failed to stir his ambition, and he turned his attention to conducting.

One of his first engagements in the capacity of conductor was in connection with a provincial tour organized by Mr. William Greet the répertoire consisting of various comic operas, which were then popular, and it was here that he maintains he gained his greatest experience. Later, through the kindness of Signor Mancinelli, who was then the chief conductor at the Covent Garden opera, he came under the notice of Sir Augustus Harris, who engaged Mr. Ronald as maestro al piano and second conductor for the season in 1891. The next step on the ladder of responsibility was a tour for two consecutive seasons with Sir Augustus Harris's Italian Opera Company, during which Mr. Ronald was joint conductor. Soon after this highly educative experience he assumed the direction of some English Opera seasons which were given at Drury Lane Theatre, and in 1895 he was again assistant-conductor, during the Grand Opera season at Covent Garden. Previous to this, Madame Melba had recognized the gifts of the young artist as an accompanist, and he had played for her at all her various concerts. The confidence thus inspired led her to engage Mr. Ronald to go to America, in the capacity of conductor, on a tour that she had arranged, which included visits to all the most important cities in the United States. Following upon this, Signor Tosti arranged for Mr. Ronald to help him in his duties as accompanist at Court, and from then to the present time, Mr. Ronald has often been chosen to accompany at the various State concerts that take place either at Windsor, Balmoral, or Buckingham Palace.

A year after the death of Sir Augustus Harris, in 1896, Mr. Landon Ronald left Covent Garden Theatre, and directed musical comedy at the Lyric Theatre under the management of Mr. Tom B. Davis, with whom he remained for three or four years. It was during this period that he conducted various concerts for Madame Melba and Herr Kubelik, but no opportunity had yet been accorded him for doing serious orchestral work in London concert rooms. But meantime, and probably to his ultimate advantage, he gained experience and maturity at Blackpool, where he was engaged, with an orchestra of eighty, for Sunday concerts during the summer season.

On the formation of the London Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Ronald's services became in demand for the highest orchestral concert work. After conducting many concerts of all kinds for this splendid orchestra, Mr. Ronald was invited to visit Berlin and conduct the famous Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Here, as we all remember, he achieved one of the greatest successes ever gained by a foreigner, and never before by a British conductor. The German critics, who do not easily give themselves away, were eloquent in their praises, and one of the best-known writers went so far as to say that Mr. Ronald 'combined the qualities of our greatest conductors, such as Weingartner, Mahler and Nikisch.'

Mr. Ronald gained similar laurels in Vienna, Leipsic and Bremen. This success abroad had the natural result of awakening his countrymen to his ability, and work began to pour in upon him. He soon discovered that in order to realize fully his personal interpretations it was necessary for him to have an orchestra of his own, and as, at this juncture, an exceptionally fine body of instrumentalists called the 'New Symphony Orchestra' was seeking a conductor, it was soon arranged that Mr. Ronald should be their permanent director. The present season is the second under the new régime. Since he has assumed this position, both he and the orchestra have taken a prominent part in the musical life of London. The organization is engaged this season to appear every Sunday at the Albert Hall, and besides it will fulfil many other engagements with the National Sunday League. In addition, it gives symphony concerts at the Queen's Hall, and its services are greatly in request in accompanying other concerts in London.

Mr. Ronald also conducts from time to time such organizations as the Scottish Orchestra, the Bradford Permanent Orchestra, and for the past five years has directed a season of promenade concerts at Birmingham, and he still continues the Blackpool Sunday symphony concerts during August and September. From all this it is clear that his life has now become as busy as it is useful. Last Christmas he was specially invited by the Academy of Saint Cecilia to conduct one of their orchestral concerts in Rome, and the great success of the venture, especially in the performance of Elgar's Symphony for the first time in Italy, was only recently recorded in these columns. In this connection he mentions as a curious experience the habit of Italian audiences to shout 'boo' when they desire to encore or to show approval.

In the course of his varied career Mr. Ronald has acted as musical critic to the Artist, the Onlooker and the Tatler, but for the past four years he has forsaken this vocation and instead has offered himself for sacrifice.

As a composer of songs Mr. Ronald has been eminently successful, and he has also written several works for orchestra, including a Suite de Ballet, a Symphonic poem, a Birthday overture, two Dramatic scenes for voice and orchestra, several Song-cycles for voice and orchestra, and two of the most successful ballets ever produced at the Alhambra Theatre, viz., 'Britannia's Realm' and 'L'Entente Cordiale.'

In answer to questions as to orchestral balance and disposition of the various classes of instruments, Mr. Ronald says that he considers the ideal balance for a full orchestra of 110 performers to be as follows: 1st violins 20, 2nd violins 20, violas 10, violoncellos 12, double-basses 10, double-wind (8 horns or 6, with first and third doubled), and the usual percussion. He prefers to adhere to the customary plan of placing 1st violins on the left and 2nd violins on the right of the conductor. The arrangement of 1st and 2nd violins all on the left side has some advantages, but it sometimes destroys antiphonal effect designed by a composer.

The programmes of orchestral concerts are easier to criticise than to arrange. The question always arises whether they should be chosen with a view to interest the general public or the more or less fastidious critic who is naturally bored by constant repetitions of the classics. It is almost impossible to satisfy both parties. Inasmuch as the public, which knows what it likes and likes what it knows, can scarcely be expected to forego its desires in order to accommodate the critics, it seems fair to expect that these servants of the public should not be over-caustic and severe in condemning those concessions to the popular demands which enable an unsubsidized orchestra to exist. It would be an interesting experiment for a committee of critics to draw up ideal programmes and at the same time guarantee the financial result. Mr. Ronald has always sturdily upheld the claims of the British composer to a hearing. His programmes both abroad and at home are a witness to the sincerity of his desires. He says that the gods he worships as conductors are Nikisch and Weingartner, but all the same he has a style of his own. The reputation of the musicians named has been born of their strong and inimitable individual insight and commanding personality.

Mr. Ronald has a keen sense of absolute pitch, and a remarkably retentive and exact memory of music. At some recent provincial concerts he conducted a whole evening's programme without using a score. He memorised Elgar's Symphony for the occasion of his remarkable performance of this work with the New Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall, on February 24, and he conducted it practically without score, although it was placed upon the desk to avoid the suspicion of pose. Mr. Ronald does not indulge in much physical exercise in the act of conducting. He gains his control by the firmness of his manner and the certainty of his beat. He is not converted to the idea of conducting without a baton. A cool conductor inspires confidence. We are all familiar with the red and fussy conductor who uses his whole body to give an elaborate invitation to the first violins to make an obvious entry, and whose frantic beat to the horns after they have entered proves that he has lost the place in the score.

Some account of Mr. Ronald's early difficulties will be interesting to many who have held the conductor's baton. A bête noire of the inexperienced conductor is syncope. The more skilfully this contradiction of normal pulsation is played, the more likely is the unsteady conductor to be embarrassed. Pianoforte concertos try the nerve and alertness apart even from the vagaries of the solo performer. Mr. Ronald recalls a celebrated passage in Schumann's Pianoforte concerto and another in Tchaikovsky's Concerto in B flat, which on the first occasion of his conducting gave him pride a shock. But Mr. Ronald declares that he found the Beethoven sforzandos much more difficult to control. He is not too proud to confess that when he first conducted the London Symphony Orchestra he was entirely overcome by some of those strong cross-accent, and that only the skill of the Orchestra enabled him to get through without disaster. Pauses and the immediate following context are again tests of control. Here it is necessary for a conductor to have determined beforehand exactly what is to be done.

Mr. Ronald has not yet reached the old age of his youth. He has the world before him, if not at his feet. His numerous friends will watch his future progress with interest and goodwill.

MUSINGS IN A LIBRARY.

II.

The more I think of it the more curious does that custom appear which has compelled composers to issue their works in batches of certain fixed numbers. The earliest quartets and sonatas—those of such people as Buononcini, San Martini, and Corelli—were issued either twelve or six at a time, generally the former; a little later it was either six or three, generally the former, but never eleven, ten, nine, seven, or five. It is clear that custom alone dictated these numbers, for we find even Beethoven adhering to it in his earliest works, whether long or short. How dreadful to think of the custom extending to opera or oratorio, and trilogies becoming general! Then when it became the fashion to write Etudes, these had to be put forth in dozens, and Preludes only in sets of twenty-four. That eccentric creature Scriabine, having paid respect to this custom, has, I am thankful to say, broken it up by publishing his later Preludes in batches of the most scandalous irregularity—every number except six and twelve. Thus easily do we attain originality! Ye who issue albums of pieces or songs, pray take note: the dozen and half-dozen stamps your work with the commercial brand. Be irregular: give us five, seven, eleven or thirteen now and again; any fixed number looks so terribly like writing to order.

And now, what is this indecently obese volume that catches my eye in an obscure corner of the library? Its back, glued on to the sheets—an offensive sight to the bibliophile—is cracked in several places, but the title, 'The Dawning of Music in Kentucky,' and the author's modest pseudonym, 'Western Minstrel,' can still be read. This seems to promise excitement. It yields reluctantly to my clutch, leaving its side-covers behind. One of these bears a leather label, some seven inches square, with the following inscription:

The "Western Minstrel"

Humbly submits an offering of the wanderings of his untutored Muse, emanating from the Wilds of KENTUCKY, to the ingenious and unbiassed inspection of the Musical Philosopher minute but exquisite handwriting. I must quote the first two sentences of this, long as they are, for the sake of their sublime style and sentiments:

DR. CROTCH

President of the Royal Academy of Music in Great Britain.

A. P. HEINRICH.

Doctor Crotch!

When the Minstrel of the Woods, but a few years ago, was lingering in great obscurity and privations in the regions of Kentucky, a print of the day fell into his hands, bringing him the glad tidings of the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music in G.B., affording there, to the sons of musical genius, under your erudite Presidency, ample opportunities for the improvement of their talents. The Author, deprived of advantages such as those, without any resources, save his own and the recollections of chords which once by their charms delighted him in the days of his childhood, was again awakened, by the intelligence of that establishment, and in seizing his Sylvan harp, sang strains, which a natural desire from (sic) being heard beyond those forest regions, made vocal only by wilder notes than his, prompted him with the lofty idea of presenting himself to the notice of the illustrious musical tribunal in G.B. and other great Literati of the high towering Metropolis of the British dominions.

This is dated Boston, August, 1826.

Next we have a well-engraved ornamental title-page with a pretty vignette, emblematical of Kentucky, no doubt, and then a somewhat bombastic Preface, in which the composer gives vent to the worthy sentiment that 'Fears of just criticism by Competent Masters should never retard the enthusiasm of genius, when ambitious of producing works more lasting than the too many Butterfly-effusions of the present age.' Ah, that present age! What a bad time it always was!

After this the experienced reader knows pretty well what to expect. A vast number of songs and pieces are here bound together, not indeed of a hopelessly trivial type, but of that kind which one can only designate as Early Victorian. You will understand what I mean if you think of the songs that used to be given away as supplements to the Illustrated London News any time earlier than 1860. The harmony rarely gets beyond tonic and dominant, but the pianoforte writing is sometimes exceedingly florid, on one occasion going into notes with nine tails, which I should think must be a record. The composer indulges in elaborate directions, couched mostly in fluent and idiomatic Italian, and shows everywhere indications of a lively and energetic temperament. The titles and dedications of his works are varied and fantastic to the verge of absurdity, the most interesting thing being the glimpses they afford of his life and doings. Thus, one 'March Concertante' 'intended for full orchestra,' is dedicated 'To the citizens of Schönbüchel, Schönlinde and Georgswalde in the Kingdom of Bohemia,' and 'The Author informs our American public that the above places (celebrated for their flourishing manufactories) were the scenes of his juvenile attachments. At Schönbüchel he entered the Gamut of Life; and at Schönlinde and Georgswalde (places which contain more than one hundred scientific musical performers) commenced his Chromatic Variations in the Counterpoint of human affairs.' A pretty and tasteful metaphor this! But a little later comes a piece entitled

Within is a loose fly-leaf containing an elaborate MS. dedication running to some forty lines of 'The Minstrel's petition: Votive Wreath for the Pianoforte,' bearing a dedication to the Empress of Austria which gives us a curious insight into Mr. Heinrich's affairs. It runs thus:

With trembling do I address your Majesty and present you a few blossoms of my Sylvan Muse, from the American Woods. I am a native of Bohemia, a Son of misfortune, cast amid the distant regions of Kentucky. A Babe—my child—a motherless infant—claims me back to my native soil; but alas! I apprehend, I shall never be enabled to revisit the shores (sic) of Austria, or again behold my daughter Antonia. She was presented to me by an American Lady of superior personal and mental endowments, while on a tour to Bohemia. A most cruel fate parted Mother and Father from the dear pledge of affection, when she had scarcely entered on this vale of tears. The tender mother rests in the silent grave—and the surviving parent, far from his native home, and that object, which alone binds him to this world, is a prey to the corrosions of anguish.

With the patriotism and energy of a Bohemian, I can confidently assert and incontestably prove, that in a commercial point of view, I have conferred superior benefits on Austria, since my residence in the United States. During my mercantile transactions I have lost nearly a Million of Florins, and have yet considerable claims in litigation in the Imperial Dominions, which, most probably, I shall never recover; but the sacrifice of millions would be cheerfully made, for the happiness of again pressing to my paternal bosom my child, or again to restore her the irremediable loss of a mother.

Your Majesty will vouchsafe to pardon this brief sketch of sufferings, wrested from a convulsed heart; and will sympathise with an orphan child, if not with an unfortunate Father. You are the august Mother of the land—the legitimate protectress of orphans, and the widow's stay. Various reasons demand from me an explanation to the community, especially to that of my native country. I make therefore this public appeal to your Majesty and present my helpless Infant to your throne of grace and benevolence, with the anxious hope that you will extend towards her your countenance and patronage. Fortuitously, you may foster one, whose life may be spared to prove her gratitude to her Sovereign and (be) a blessing to Bohemia.

The Spirit of her sainted mother will watch your slumbers, and Heaven will reward the benevolence which relieves from a weight of Misery, a Parent, who fervently, from the Western hemisphere, offers up his orisons to the King of Kings for the welfare of your Imperial family, and who, with a throbbing heart, subscribes himself an afflicted Father,

And your Majesty's most humble,

Devoted and obedient Servant,

ANTHONY PHILIP HEINRICH.

Emotion seems to have affected the Minstrel's punctuation a good deal, and his ideas of the 'superior benefits' he has conferred upon Austria are quaint, but one cannot help being interested in these revelations. In my sentimental way I picture the kind Empress adopting the little orphan, who, thus cast away, as one may say, on the coast of Bohemia, grows up beautiful (of course) and oh, so good! She captures the heart of Prince Florizel, rejects the guilty splendour which he offers, and dies of a broken heart. The Western Minstrel returns to Austria, vows vengeance over his child's grave, joins the Anarchists, and becomes the instigator of the Empress's assassination. It was a different girl—I mean Empress—but that is of no consequence in a romance or an opera libretto.

Poor Mr. Heinrich! From another of these wonderful and voluminous prefaces we learn that he sank so low in the world as to become a turnkey in a prison. One would like to know what really became of him. Many men there were in his time, like Sir Henry Bishop, whose music was little, if at all, superior to his, who were looked up to as sterling musicians. Let us hope that the ingenuous settlers of Kentucky respected the worthy soul, who at least poured forth his effusions—as he confesses—for pure love of it and not with any expectation of reward.

BYGONE COMIC SONG TUNES: A STUDY OF MELODY SURVIVALS.

— BY FRANK KIDSON.

To the frequenters of such places it may appear strange that at one period of English history there were no music-halls! During such a time (blissful, or the reverse, as the reader must personally decide) people sang comic and topical songs for themselves, either round the family board or at friendly tables and firesides, or, still more frequently, at snug little taverns where each comer was expected to contribute to the general harmony by giving a toast or singing a song.

It was for such as these that those quaint 'Little Warblers' were printed and published—books the size of a large postage stamp, adapted for the waistcoat pockets of such gay dogs as the Dick Swivellers of the 'thirties' and 'forties.' At many of these places musical clubs were formed, and everybody was either deeply sentimental or screamingly funny.

Then arose 'Caves of Harmony,' where professional mingled with amateur talent. It is needless to refer the reader to that memorable episode in which Colonel Newcome and Captain Costigan figured in Thackeray's novel.

Without entering into any description of, or considering the ethics of such matters, the readers of the Musical Times will, I feel sure, be interested in the music used for the comic or topical song at the period referred to, and those of an age prior.

The conditions which ruled this class of song were entirely different from those of the present day, the change taking place with the advent of the modern music-hall, fifty or sixty years ago.

There were then current a series of what may be called stock tunes, many being of high melodic value, which served as vehicles (musical hackney coaches as it were, ready to carry anything, but freely, for the airs were non-copyright) for topical and humorous songs. These airs had in many instances superseded tunes, equally fine, which had amused the bucks of the early 18th century in a similar way, to ditties amorous or political.

We may in this present article leave these early melodies, and deal more particularly with the tunes that were popular at, or shortly before, the Regency.

Choosing at random, we may take the famous 'Bow, wow, wow' as a typical example. The original song was a feeble production that first came into notice about 1760 or 1770. In a rather lame manner it showed, in doggerel verse

(no pun meant), how every class of humanity might be likened to the canine race. A barking chorus of 'Bow, wow, wow!' with some 'fol-diddle-dols' to fill up, gave every one a chance to join in. This is a specimen verse out of at least a dozen, all equally bad:

A swindler he's a sorry dog, he's always cheating;
A Frenchman he's a nimble dog, he runs from every beating;
The soldier he's a noble dog, in every rank and station,
And a sailor he's a hearty dog, as any in the nation.
Bow, wow, wow, etc.

Nevertheless, the tune is good and it quickly took the public's fancy. The words underwent revision and were frequently sung. Then, as a natural consequence, came 'Mew, mew, mew,' in which, with equal banality, the human race was compared to cats; this was publicly sung in 1788. About this period the tune stood thus:

Dogs and cats banished, a classical flavour was imparted by a song written and sung by Collins in a table entertainment, about 1790. This was a sort of moral comic ditty which dealt in scholastic fashion with the misfortunes of Belisarius: its title was 'Date obolum Belisario,' and it was even worse than the original of the dogs. Then the tune changed a little, to fit more neatly other songs, which included 'The Barking barber' and some others.

There is no need to go through the list: one was about the abortive Peace negotiations of 1806, another about the finding of a specimen of the mammoth, and both are very witty at the expense of Bonaparte, the latter making the obvious point:

And as it is a skeleton, they call it Boney part, sirs.

The tune had then arrived at this period of development:

Then arose Thomas Hudson's clever song 'Guy Fawkes, or As it might have been,' and the last heard of the tune, as a living melody, was about 1868, when it was used on the music-hall stage. Such tenacity indicates that it must possess all the essentials of good melody, and indeed of these stock tunes half-a-hundred might be easily cited that carried one popular song after another for great lengths of time.

These airs might be perhaps pipers' or fiddlers' tunes. They may have originally appeared in ballad or other opera, or they may have been street tunes from an unknown source. Whatever they were, they had inherent merit to so generally please for such considerable time and to survive the balderdash that was associated with them. We may glance at a few more.

Readers of 'David Copperfield' may remember Mr. Micawber (over a steaming bowl of punch) in his misery in the Fleet prison singing 'Gee ho, Dobbin.' Few will be familiar to-day with the once popular chorus, although, after amusing generations of people since 1750, it may still be heard, unrecognised by its original title, on Tyneside, singing the praises of 'Cappy,' the pitman's dog. Here is the first version of the air:

An equal favourite with our grandfathers and great-grandfathers was 'The Dandy Oh' (also remembered to another song on Tyneside).

Thomas Moore was bold enough to write 'Eveleen's Bower' to the air, although it had won its way into the heart of the comic singer by detailing the career of a captain with legs that 'the regiment called bandy Oh,' and whose beverage, for sake of rhyme, was 'brandy Oh':

'Ally Croaker,' an Irish tune, sang many themes besides its original, including 'Unfortunate Miss Bailey,' and 'The Golden days of good Queen Bess':

Perhaps the most popular tune for what may be called the narrative ballad was 'Derry Down,' and this held its own for a couple of centuries. 'King John and the Abbot of Canterbury' was sung to it. Mat Prior wrote his 'Thief and the Cordelier' to the air, then it had a spell of a hundred years to 'A Cobler there was and he lived in a stall.' One might fill several pages of this journal by a bare list of songs known to have been sung to one or the other version of 'Derry Down,' for there were two, and a third of later date as well. Here is one of the earlier versions:

Another air better adapted to the 'patter' song was the 'King and the West Countryman,' a ballad, in its original state, of great antiquity. Its monotone and easy refrain of 'ritooral, ritooral,' was tempting, and small wonder that such songs as 'The cork leg,' the narrative of that unfortunate Dutchman whose mechanical leg walked him out of existence, should renew an already long life of favour. Needless to say 'The steam arm' and the rest of the parodies of the immortal 'Cork leg' were used with this air:

I have said that sometimes the popular melody came from an opera, and a notable instance just occurs to me. In 1780, at Covent Garden, was performed an altered version of Fielding's 'Tom Thumb.' The music of the new opera was 'composed and compiled by J. Markordt,' the libretto being by Kane O'Hara. There is a fine tune, whether 'composed or compiled' I cannot say, fitted to the words 'Sure, such a day,' sung as a duet by Noodle and Doodle (Mr. Edwin and Mr. Robson). This took England by storm, the England of comic-singers at any rate, and presently, when the original words had lost their significance, topical songs were written to it in great numbers. Possibly the first was the lay of the 'Tortoiseshell tom cat,' by Thomas Dibdin, founded on a real circumstance, for about the beginning of the 19th century a feline Thomas of the tortoiseshell variety was sold for an immense sum. This is how the song started, and patter filled up the intervals between the verses:

Oh, what a story the papers have been telling us,
About a little animal of mighty price,
And who ever thought but an auctioneer of selling us,
For near three hundred yellow boys, a trap for mice?

and so forth. The song had its vogue, and was only superseded when the craze for the recently introduced quadrille displaced the old-fashioned country dance.

It was then that a ditty commencing:

Run, neighbours, run, all London is quadrilling it,
Order and sobriety are dos a dos;
This is the day for toeing it and heeling it,
All are promenading it from high to low.

Other songs followed in plenty. This is the air from Markordt's opera:

SURE, SUCH A DAY.

In this opera, it may be mentioned, occurs Jingle's song (in 'Pickwick'):-

In hurry, post haste, for a licence,
In hurry, ding dong, I come back.

Popular music may not be the highest form of the art, but certain it is that melody of such lasting quality that it will appeal to many generations of people, whose modes of thought and life have changed so completely as ours have these past few centuries, is to be respected, and the fact carries with it a certificate of inherent excellence. The love of good melody has always been a characteristic of the English nation, and the comic-song tunes I have dealt with are part of its inheritance.

HOW A TRUMPET IS MADE.

By D. J. BLAIKLEY.

V.—MODERN TRUMPETS AND OTHER BRASS VALVE INSTRUMENTS.

It was noticed in the last section of this series of articles that the alteration of the fundamental pitch of a wind instrument, and consequently the completion of its scale, was very efficiently accomplished by a shifting telescopic slide as used on the trombone, and reference was also made to the necessary limitation of the principle to instruments of the trumpet and trombone type. We have now to consider the origin and development of the modern valve system, which has revolutionised open-air music and has provided a new range of tone-colour for the use of the orchestral composer. The valve action in its effect may be compared both to the crook and to the slide, inasmuch as the object is to add to the normal length of the instrument. It is like the crook in that the added length is definite in amount and adapted for a semitone, tone, or tone and a-half as the case may be, but unlike it in that it can be brought into action instantaneously. In the latter characteristic it is like the slide, but differs from it by reason of its fixed length.

The credit of the invention is due to two instrumentalists—Blümel, a Silesian oboe-player, and Stölzel, a horn-player of Breslau—the originator of the idea being Blümel, who devised piston-valves for the horn about the year 1813. He sold his right to Stölzel, who improved upon the invention and took out a patent in Germany for a horn with three pistons.

The early piston-valves were heavy, and slow in action. Improvement however was rapid, although the angular passages and constricted air-ways through the pistons caused trouble for a long time, and to these defects must probably be attributed a certain prejudice against the whole system which no doubt existed. Many variations upon, and substitutes for, the piston-valves were brought out, but with the exception of the rotary cylinder action, to be presently noticed, all these have passed away and have therefore now merely a historical interest. The general type of piston-valve which resulted from the various early attempts has not changed much since 1851, when Dr. J. P. Oates exhibited improved designs of his own at the International Exhibition in London, and it is the piston-valve which is now practically universal in England, France and America. Soon after the introduction of the piston or vertically-acting valve by Blümel and Stölzel, a definitely alternative means of obtaining the same result was brought out in Germany and is still largely used in that country and in Austria. This alternative is the rotary cylinder valve, which, although good in many ways, has the mechanical defects inseparable from a system of many moving parts. Regarded in the simplest manner, the rotary valve is a four-way cock, which, by the depression of the finger-piece or key, is made to rotate through a quarter-circle and thus to introduce extra tubing to the effective length of the air-column.

The piston-valve has three passages carried through the cylindrical shell or tube which forms the piston proper, but which, by a curious use of language, is technically called the 'pump.' One of these passages, in use when the piston is in its raised or undisturbed position, acts merely as a portion of the tube-length of the normal instrument, and the other two passages when the piston is depressed serve to lead the air into and out of an extra length of tubing, by which means the fundamental pitch of the instrument, and consequently all its harmonics, are, until the valve is released, changed. The valve system does not demand as a pre-requisite a considerable length of cylindrical tube on which another tube can work as a slide, and therefore its range of application is far wider than that of the shifting slide, which is practically confined to trombones. It is this adaptability to instruments of any pitch from soprano to contrabass, and of any tone-quality from the brilliancy of the soprano trumpet to the rich fullness or diapason-like breadth of the modern bass tubas or bombardons, which has given the valves their present pre-eminence.

As a matter of practical convenience brass instruments are usually classed under two heads—i.e., cylindrical, with bell expansion, such as trumpets and trombones, and conical, either with slight taper as the French horn, or with greater and sometimes a very rapid taper, the latter group comprising bugles and saxhorns of all kinds. The best known and most popular of all brass instruments, the cornet, does not lend itself well to classification, as it is in character a hybrid between a trumpet and a bugle.

No tube, however, which in the ordinary sense of the word is conical can be associated with a cylindrical tube, whether permanently, as on the natural trumpet, or temporarily, as when a valve is depressed on a saxhorn, without the intonation of the harmonic series being disturbed. The straight boundary lines of the ordinary cone have therefore to be modified so that the flow of line from the cylindrical portion of the instrument to the bell mouth is approximately represented by the hyperbola, and the correctness of intonation, ease of blowing, and beauty of tone-quality depend largely upon the way in which this modification of conical form is carried out.

The general result of the application of valves is that we now have in the 'brass' a whole class of instruments with many subdivisions into groups with different tone-qualities, the complete series embracing a compass about one octave greater than that of the human voice; for while the upper limit is about the same as in the soprano voice, the lower one extends about one octave beyond the extreme limit of the bass voice. For instance:

is a fairly easy note for either a soprano voice or a cornet, but an exceptional singer or instrumentalist can take a few notes higher; and to take the lower limit, while is quite exceptional in the bass voice, Sir E. Elgar has written the D flat an octave lower in a descending chromatic passage for the tuba. If G or F is regarded as an average lower limit for the bass voice, in the same way these notes an octave lower may be regarded as the limit for the tuba or bombardon in all but exceptional cases. The whole class of brass instruments therefore affords a compass of from four to five octaves, with chromatic intervals. Each particular instrument on the three-valve system has an easy compass of two octaves, and the basses with four valves have an extra octave downwards, for by the use of four valves, as will presently be described, the whole octave between the first and second harmonics is made chromatically available.

In modern practice the three valves, controlled by the first, second and third fingers, lower the pitch a tone, semitone, and tone and a-half respectively, and by their combinations give two, two and a-half, and three tones, so that in all, including the unaltered instrument, there are seven different fundamental lengths, corresponding to the seven 'positions' on the slide trombone, each one giving the harmonic series by varying the lip-pressure. A little consideration will show that many notes of the chromatic scale can be obtained by different fingerings. It must be observed however, that the notes represented by the seventh natural harmonic in each case are seldom used, as the interval 7-8 is greater than the major tone, which is represented by 8-9. There are also further slight differences in the pitch of notes nominally the same, or enharmonically differing, and these slight differences afford in many cases a means of tempering the pitch of a note according to its place in the chord. Against this advantage must be set a slight disadvantage, or error, inherent in all the ordinary valve systems, arising from a natural law of proportion, i.e., that any increment in length for a given interval should be in a certain ratio to the already existing length. Now assume that an instrument in C has its first valve tuned to give B \flat and its third valve tuned to give a tone and a-half, or A. If, by using the first valve, and lowering the pitch to B \flat , we have virtually made the instrument longer, the third valve, adjusted to give a tone and a-half on C, is not quite long enough to give the same difference on B \flat and thus make a true G. In short, valves in combination give notes somewhat sharp, and many ingenious contrivances have been designed to overcome the difficulty, which is greatly increased when a fourth valve is added. Apart from these inventions the usual practice is to give the tubing of the third valve rather more than the length requisite for a tone and a-half, so as to minimise the error when the valve is used in combination with others. The error is greatest when all three valves are used together, and therefore the low f \sharp and c \sharp should be avoided as much as possible in music for valve instruments: the actual pitch of the notes written as f \sharp and c \sharp varies with the key of the instrument.

The general grouping of brass instruments into cylindrical with bell expansion and conical with either slight or rapid taper must now be more particularly referred to. The first group comprises trumpets and trombones, and of these, trumpets, in the present day, whether for orchestral or military band use, are almost universally fitted with valves. Trombones, although frequently made with valves, are still mainly, and properly, regarded as slide instruments, for their peculiar tone-quality suffers more from the introduction of valves than the tone of any other class. The natural bass of the trumpet is the trombone, and the latter instrument, having a larger bell and mouthpiece, even when of the same pitch affords greater facility for the production of the lower notes. Therefore, a trumpet and a trombone of the same length and standing in the same key, say E \flat , which for the trombone would be that of the little-used alto trombone, have a relationship which may be compared to that between the soprano and contralto voices. The tenor and bass voices would be represented by the B \flat tenor and G or F bass trombone.

Intermediate between the first and second group must be placed the cornet, an instrument easily vulgarized. Though it has not the characteristic brilliancy of the trumpet, its quality is very suitable for vocal and melodic parts, and for this reason it holds its important position in military and brass bands. For orchestral use, however, especially when associated with the trombones, the trumpet is to be preferred.

The place of honour in the second group must be given to the French horn, on account both of its age and of its importance. As now made, with three valves, the importance of crooks for change of key has become a very minor matter, and it is very generally used in F only, the changes of key (formerly effected by change of crook) being easily obtained by the valves or by the valves and transposition to a nearly related key. As the horn is an instrument with very narrow tubing for its length and a small mouthpiece, the upper harmonics are more easily produced than on brass instruments generally, although some of the old trumpet parts are carried relatively as high.

Trumpets, trombones and horns, apart from exceptional instruments, constitute the 'brass' section of the orchestra, the exceptional members being the cornet, as an addition to, or substitute for, the trumpet, and the wide-bore basses, or euphonium and bombardon, sometimes named tubas.

Of the conical instruments the Army bugle may be regarded as the type and origin. About the year 1843, Sax conceived the idea of developing the bugle into a whole family of instruments, ranging from soprano to contrabass in register, and all fitted with valves; of these the flugel horns (soprano and alto) and the althorns (tenor and baritone) are all strictly of the bugle type in quality and compass. To obtain a broader and more massive tone for the bass instruments the conical expansion was greatly increased, and this increase, with other details, rendered the octave between the first and second harmonics available. In this way a marked difference is maintained between the baritone saxhorn, or althorn, and the euphonium, although both instruments are of the same length and pitch.

As a summary of the foregoing details, the following grouping of modern brass instruments may be found convenient :

1ST GROUP.—French horns and trumpets, which make use of all the harmonics from the 2nd or 3rd up to the 16th, but with the limitation that the upper harmonics are difficult on the higher crooks.

2ND GROUP.—Cornets, trombones and saxhorns, which seldom use harmonics above the 8th, and which do not habitually employ the fundamental notes.

3RD GROUP.—Euphoniums and bombardons, or tubas, with upward limit about the same as in the 2nd Group, but as the notes in the pedal octave between the 1st and 2nd harmonics are freely used, the relative compass downwards in the 3rd Group is about one octave greater than in the 2nd.

This downward extension is obtained by means of a fourth valve, which adds to the instrument tubing of the length required to lower it a fourth, as from c to G. When, however, the fourth valve is used in combination with others, as for instance with the first and second to produce D, the cumulative error of valves in combination is so marked that the note is far too sharp. Several schemes have been devised to counteract this natural effect, all of which have for their object the introduction of extra tubing to make up the deficiency in the combined lengths, and a bass instrument without compensation of this kind is unsuitable for modern orchestral requirements.

It is customary in writing for bass brass instruments to write in the bass clef and show the actual pitch of the notes. For all others the treble clef is used, whether the compass of the instrument is soprano, alto, tenor or baritone, with the exception of the tenor trombone, for which the tenor clef is used. For the cornet, the high-pitched trumpet, and for all saxhorns, the second harmonic is placed on middle C, but for trumpets in their lower crooks, and for French horns, this C represents the fourth harmonic. Therefore the second, third and fourth harmonics of the cornet and saxhorn, whatever may be their actual pitch as determined by their key-note, are written thus :

and on the French horn are written :

so that the more generally used notes, that is to say, the notes from the fourth to the twelfth harmonics, lie well on the staff.

From what has been said it will be seen that brass instruments, when the treble clef is used, are treated as 'transposing' instruments, but as 'non-transposing' when written for in the bass clef. The traditions and customs which have led to this practice afford an interesting field for examination and speculation, but lie somewhat outside the proper limit of these articles.

(Conclusion.)

Occasional Notes.

At the meeting of the general committee of the Birmingham Musical Festival, held on March 16, it was announced that the last festival resulted in a loss of £1,172. The receipts for the 1906 festival were £9,778, and for the 1909 festival, £7,353. No one reason can be given for this serious falling off. It may have arisen from the unattractiveness of the programme or because of bad trade, or because of the competition of other festivals for the support of the musical public, or from all of these causes combined. Some would say that a contributory cause was the fact that 'Judas' was substituted for 'The Messiah.' It was certainly a bold experiment to make the change. There are yet innumerable music-lovers who regard it as a religious and edifying duty to listen to Handel's greatest oratorio splendidly performed. They deserve consideration.

Another announcement of importance made on this occasion was that Dr. Richter, in accordance with the notice given years before, would not again officiate as conductor. Thus an epoch in the history of the festival, and a glorious one on the whole, is now closed. Much could be said regarding the enormous influence exerted by Dr. Richter since his first connection with Birmingham in 1885. His services cannot now be duly acknowledged here. It must suffice at present to say that the great conductor retires with honour from the post he has filled so nobly.

The question of a successor will soon be a pressing one. It is not for us to attempt to interfere with a committee that has in the past shown great discrimination and boldness. But we may be allowed to express the hope that it will be found possible to secure the services of a competent native conductor. When Dr. Richter was appointed there were few if any British conductors who could aspire to such an exalted position. But now surely, to our great pride, we have amongst us men who have proved their ability in the highest departments of the conductor's art. Another consideration is that, inasmuch as the great festival programmes must, it would seem, be largely composed of choral works, an English conductor has generally more experience and sympathy with such music than the foreign conductor, brought up almost exclusively in an orchestral atmosphere, can bring to bear upon it.

Mr. C. W. Perkins has been recently honored by a command from the German Emperor to play before him on the Cathedral organ in Berlin. We quote the following from the Berliner Lokal-Anzeiger, of March 17: 'When the Emperor was staying in England last year, he was struck by the wonderful playing of an organist in one of the churches, and invited him to come some day to Berlin to show his art on the Cathedral organ. Both the Emperor and Empress expressed to the artist their unbounded admiration of his rarely beautiful playing, which was beyond all praise.' The following is the programme chosen by the Kaiser and played by Mr. Perkins on this interesting occasion:

Organ Sonata in D minor, No. 6	Mendelssohn.
Prelude, 'Dream of Gerontius'	Elgar.
Prelude and Fugue in C	Bach.
Prelude to Act III. 'Die Meistersinger'	Wagner.

The programme book of the concert given by the Oxford House Choral Society at Queen's Hall on March 8 (noticed in another column), gives some interesting information about the work and objects of the Oxford House Musical and Dramatic Association. This was formed for the purpose of regularly providing the people of Bethnal Green with a series of high-class musical and other entertainments, in a locality where the only other class of entertainment is to be found in the music-halls. The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Cuthbert Kelly, is recruited entirely from the neighbourhood, and does an important work there, in encouraging and stimulating the growing taste for good music, the works recently performed having included Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Dvorák's 'Te Deum,' Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' and 'Elijah,' 'Creation,' 'The Golden Legend,' &c. The concerts take place in Excelsior Hall, seating about 1,200 people, on Saturday evenings throughout the Winter season, and alternately with these have been given, for the last eight years, a series of Shakespearean performances by Mr. Charles Fry and his company. During this period no less than twenty of Shakespeare's plays—Comedies, Histories and Tragedies—have been performed on a draped stage, and it has been estimated, by those best capable of knowing, that at the lowest computation over 80,000 persons have witnessed these representations.

Incidental music plays an important part in these performances, the whole of Sullivan's music to 'Henry VIII.' and the 'Merchant of Venice,' and music for other plays by Arthur Fox, Berthold Tours and others, having been performed during the season by the small select orchestra, conducted by Mr. Cuthbert Kelly. The Princess Marie Louise—who with the Princess Christian takes a personal interest in the work of the Association—was present recently at a performance of the 'Merchant of Venice,' and expressed her gratification at the intelligent appreciation displayed by the crowded audience. The prices paid for admission are necessarily so moderate that these performances cannot be self-supporting in so poor a district, and it is therefore to be hoped that the excellent work carried on with such gratifying results by this Association will meet with practical encouragement by those interested in the education of the masses.

His Majesty The German Emperor has been graciously pleased to confer the Order of the Red Eagle (fourth class) on Mr. Alfred Littleton, Chairman of Messrs. Novello & Company.

The fourth Dover Triennial Festival will take place on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 3 and 4, when the programmes will include Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Cradle of Christ,' and Sir Charles Stanford's 'Battle of the Baltic,' the last two works conducted by their composers. The following novelties will be produced, each written specially for the occasion and conducted by their respective composers:—New work for organ and orchestra, by B. Luard-Selby; choral ballad, 'Casabianca,' by Dr. Charlton Palmer; choral ballad, 'The Eve of Waterloo,' by H. J. Taylor; and a short choral work by Louis N. Parker. The choir will consist of the Dover Choral Union and the orchestra will comprise the most prominent professional and amateur players in the district, augmented by some London instrumentalists.

It is at times borne in upon us that the young organist of to-day is in danger of being 'spoilt,' by reason of the rapid development of our church organs. He insists that unless he is given an instrument equipped with every refinement of mechanism and a fully representative list of stops, he can do justice neither to the music nor himself. We have received a letter describing an organ in a foreign Cathedral, and it seems that if we could 'condemn' some of our young enthusiasts to 'two years with hard labour' under such conditions, they would, when they 'came out,' admit that their own country is really not so badly supplied after all. Our correspondent writes:

The organ, which is divided, is played from the centre by tracker action ninety feet long, to right and left! There are seventy-six sounding stops, only about twelve of them going through, and twenty-four reeds of the most 'wicked' kind (your clarinet at — is a gem compared to any of them). There are only four open diapasons, two flôte diapasons, and all the rest mixtures and sesquialters, each more boisterous than the last, four tremulants of varying 'wobble,' half an octave of straight pedals, no composition pedals or pistons, three manuals, one of which is of two octaves only, sharps white, naturals black. There are four stops of sixteen feet, and two of these are reeds. Every stop is out of tune, and many of them are ciphering. The manuals are two hand-breadths apart, and the same difference in height. The drawstops are at a right angle, with a straight pull of nearly one foot of square, worm-eaten wood, and each stop-handle is about six inches from its fellow. The blowing is by men walking up and down just behind the console. The poor organist played a Mendelssohn Sonata about as fast as I could kick my hat, and of course without change of stops.

This is no doubt a sad picture, and we only hope it may encourage contentment amongst our younger men. We are of course (joking apart) fully in sympathy with them in their wish to possess fine instruments, but our friend's interesting letter will perhaps encourage them to make the best of what they have until the time when good fortune shall deign to smile upon them. In the meantime, let their laudable perseverance be tempered by moderation, and a regard for the requirements of their churches and music.

At a recent plébiscite concert given by Mr. Vasco Akeroyd's Symphony Orchestra in Liverpool, Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony was the chief work selected. It would appear that some surprise was expressed locally that a Symphony by Tchaikovsky had not been chosen instead. Surely the choice of Schubert's beautiful work was a sufficient indication of the wisdom of public taste, the elevation of which owes much to this interesting and enterprising series of concerts.

The Home Music Study Union proposes to hold its third annual 'Summer School' from September 3 to 13, at Port Ballintrae on the north coast of Ireland. The event is one primarily designed for members of the Union, but any persons who are attracted by the combination of open air and companionship with musical recitals and lectures will be welcomed. The lecturers will, in all probability, be Dr. E. C. Bairstow, Mr. Rutland Boughton, Mr. T. J. Hoggett (lecturer on music, Leeds University), and Mr. Percy A. Scholes ('extension lecturer,' Manchester University). Further particulars of the holiday scheme, which includes excursions to the Giant's Causeway, and other places of interest, may be obtained from the hon. secretary, Mr. J. E. Lawrence, 63, Grange Avenue, Leeds.

One of our contemporaries recently chronicled—with pride and exultation—that in a recent orchestral performance, patronised by royalty, the names of no less than four native composers appeared. Incredible investigation confirmed the fact, but it was Mr. Granville Bantock's transcription of harpsichord pieces by Byrd, Gibbons, and Dowland. Well, well! in the day of small things we must be thankful. Suites have their uses in adversity.

The Pageant of London and Empire Festival is an undertaking on a large scale. On reading the prospectus or programme, we looked carefully to see what share music is to have in the proceedings. Empire concerts are spoken of, and it is stated that every week the music and musicians will be 'drawn from' different parts of the Empire. But it is now April, and the show is to open in May. Up to the present moment, so far as we are aware, no commission for so much as a march or patriotic chorus has been offered by the committee to any English composers, great or small. So far it has been left to the energy of Dr. Charles Harriss alone to recognise and stimulate native composers for the Empire Day concert. We trust that the directors of this enterprise, the potentiality of which is great, are not under the delusion so dear to the minds of theatrical managers, that music can be turned on and off when required, like the electric light.

The Lincoln Triennial Festival will be held on Wednesday and Thursday, June 8 and 9. On the former day there will be an orchestral concert in the Corn Exchange, the programme of which will include Schumann's 'Genoveva' overture and the 'Dance of Sylphs' and 'Hungarian' march from Berlioz's 'Faust,' two Preludes from Sir Alexander Mackenzie's 'Manfred' music, Sir Edward Elgar's 'Wand of Youth' Suite, No. 2, Granville Bantock's 'The Pierrot of the Minute' and a Festival overture by Walford Davies, composed for the occasion. The four works last-named will be conducted by their respective composers. On the following day the oratorio services in the Cathedral will include the 'Dream of Gerontius' conducted by Sir Edward Elgar and Brahms's Symphony in D minor, in the afternoon; and Stanford's 'Stabat Mater,' G. J. Bennett's 'Easter Hymn,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' in the evening. The choir and orchestra will number 500 performers. Dr. G. J. Bennett will, as usual, be the conductor when not otherwise indicated.

Mr. William Johnson Galloway, who sat in Mr. Balfour's last Parliament for South-West Manchester, is at least as keen on music as on politics. A director of the Great Eastern Railway, he conducts its musical Society, and there is no better-known figure at Covent Garden. He is a steady advocate of national opera, the case for which he embodied in book form some eight years ago. In a new work, called 'Musical England,' which is now in the Press, he aims at a larger and more comprehensive conclusion. It will be published by Messrs. Christophers shortly.

Many persons will be surprised and gratified to hear that in Shanghai there is a municipally supported orchestra capable of producing modern works, and an audience capable of appreciating their performance. Here is the programme of a concert given under the direction of Mr. Rudolf Buck:

Overture	'Iphigenia in Aulis'	Gluck.
Symphony No. 2, in D major, (3 movements)	Beethoven.
Overture	'Hänsel and Gretel'	Humperdinck.
Variations on an Original Theme	Elgar.
Rakoczy March ('Le Darnation de Faust')	Berlioz.

Mr. A. Corbett Smith, who has had much to do with the concert schemes, says: 'Two seasons ago Shanghai was much in the position, musically, in which London was when Mr. Newman started at the Queen's Hall. We have worked hard, and are now reaping the fruit of our labours in excellent attendances to hear first-class programmes. The attendance at the above concert was over 1,000.'

Dr. Percy Carter Buck has been appointed to the Professorship of Music at Dublin University, an appointment for which his career as an educationist eminently fits him, and one which will give general satisfaction. Dr. Buck was born at West Ham on March 25, 1871, and was educated at the Merchant Taylors' School and Worcester College, Oxford, his tutor there being Dr. W. H. Hadow. He became a student at the Royal College of Music under Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Walter Parratt, and Dr. C. H. Lloyd. In 1896 he was appointed Organist of Wells Cathedral, and in 1899 of Bristol. His appointment as Music Master at Harrow dates from 1901.

OPERA AT COVENT GARDEN.

The Beecham opera season came to an end on March 19. Boldly conceived and very ably consummated, the scheme was a notable one, and its influence may be far reaching, especially if its promised later developments are realised. One element that made for the success of the enterprise, was the liberal support it received from the Press before the season began. The lurid, highly imaginative descriptive reporter was, to the dismay of the regular critics, turned loose by editors hungry for attractive copy, and the critics themselves assisted the boom. The undoubted merits of the scheme and this generous advertisement led to an unexpected demand for seats, so great indeed that the Press critics could not always be afforded their customary accommodation.

Every promise of the prospectus was redeemed. The following operas were produced: 'Elektra' (Strauss), 'Ivanhoe' (Sullivan), 'Tristan and Isolde' (Wagner), 'The Village Romeo and Juliet' (Delius), 'The Wreckers' (Ethel Smyth), 'L'enfant Prodigue' (Debussy), 'Hänsel and Gretel' (Humperdinck), and 'Carmen' (Bizet).

'Elektra' has been the sensation of the season. It was performed nine times—seven under Mr. Beecham and two under the composer. In our last issue we gave an account of the first performance and the impressions it created. Later hearings have served to strengthen the feeling that the work is a powerful one, but there are still features that induce doubt, and are unconvincing. The angularity of some of the vocal music is at times repellent, and being so seems to defeat its purpose of expression and naturalness.

As to the performances under the composer, it was a tribute to the ability and insight of Mr. Beecham that Strauss found so little to amend. Even in the temperament of the interpretations there were no marked differences.

'The Village Romeo and Juliet' was produced for the first time in England. The libretto is based upon a story by Keller, a Swiss poet, and is written by Mrs. Delius. A quarrel over some land leads two families into bitter feud, but, notwithstanding the situation, a daughter of one family and a son of the other are in love. They elect to elope, and after various troubles they find a despairing end in suicide. The music, as all who are acquainted with Mr. Delius's other compositions would be led to expect, is full of graces and refinements, and characteristic originality. But it is too little dramatic, and the rhythmic interest is slight. Therefore the work, admirably performed as it was, did not greatly attract. Miss Ruth Vincent was a delightful exponent of the heroine's part.

'The Wreckers' was also adequately prepared. It is a work of considerable power. The story is an English one, and it was sung in English. It affords scope for great variety and dramatic interest—qualities which are often duly reflected in Miss Smyth's music. But with all its virility and sincerity it now and then in its form lacks the concentration and quick action demanded by the drama. It is a cheap and easy general criticism that this or that work would gain by compression, but we cannot resist making the remark in this connection. But whatever the truth of the matter is, we are all grateful to Miss Smyth for the striking, and at times powerful, contribution she has made to English opera.

'Ivanhoe' was a notable revival and was gorgeously presented. It was a pity that the plans of the season would not allow of more than two performances. Sullivan's music is probably more to the taste of the average opera-goer than some of the novelties given, however temporarily attractive they appear to be. Of the other operas performed, 'Carmen,' 'Tristan,' 'L'enfant Prodigue' and 'Hänsel and Gretel,' it must suffice to say here that no pains and expense were spared to mount and perform the works adequately.

The conductors throughout the series were Mr. Thomas Beecham, Dr. Richard Strauss, Mr. Percy Pitt, Herr Bruno Walter, and Mr. Hamish McCunn. It is no reflection on the others to say that Mr. Beecham supremely distinguished himself, and that his masterly control and interpretations have placed him in the front rank of conductors.

The following is a list of the principal artists who took part: Soprani and Contralti—Miss Edyth Walker, Fräulein Fassbender, Fräulein Signe von Rappe, Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Edith Evans, Miss Ruth Vincent, Miss Betty Booker, Miss Frances Rose, Fräulein von Mildenburg, Fräulein Krull, Fräulein Petzl and Miss Muriel Terry. Tenori—Herr Urlus, M. Koubitsky, Mr. A. Royd, Mr. John Coates, Mr. Walter Hyde, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, Mr. Bindon Ayres. Baritoni and Bassi—Herr Weidemann, Mr. Robert Maitland, Mr. Albert Archdeacon, Mr. Frederick Randalow, Mr. Frederic Austin, Mr. Dillon Shallard, Mr. R. Chignell, Mr. Alfred Kaufmann and Mr. Harry Dearth. It is worthy of special note that Mr. Frederic Austin took the part of Orestes, in 'Elektra,' on March 17, without having had a stage or band rehearsal. His singing on this occasion, and on the final night (March 19), was particularly fine.

As already intimated, Mr. Beecham will direct a season of light opera at His Majesty's Theatre for eleven weeks beginning in May. The operas will be sung in English.

Church and Organ Music.

OLD ENGLISH ORGAN MUSIC.

There can be no doubt that the blandishments held out by our modern organ-builders, together with the fascination to be found in organ arrangements of orchestral and other music, have long been responsible for the neglect of works by Old English composers of organ music. But there is, after all, much to be said for the performer who is content to let the actual notes convey their own message, as contrasted with the display of registration and technique necessary, and so much thought of, in such things as the 'Reubke' Sonata, or, say, the Overture to 'Tannhäuser.' We would not for one moment disparage the ambition which prompts the self-denial and perseverance such difficulties demand, but plead for a hearing at least of what we claim to be worthy and dignified examples of English art. There is, and of course must be, variety of attractiveness and scope in these works, which depend in many cases upon the extent of the development attained in organ-building at the time the music was written. Our present instruments may with truth be said to include the possibilities to be found in those of earlier days, so that there can be little difficulty in the performance. Rather, with the responsive and delicate action of to-day, difficulty can scarcely be said to exist. There remains, then, only the question of taste, and we feel sure that the works, examples from which we are about to give, will prove attractive if given a place in our recital programmes. It should be remembered that there is much music which is more effective to the actual performer than to the listener.

The task of selecting and editing a series of works by our Old English composers has been accomplished by Mr. John E. West with conspicuous success, and with his well-known skill and insight.

From some three-dozen or more we have selected nine, which should be sufficient to awaken an interest in music of this style.

Our first example is from a manuscript of Henry Purcell in the British Museum, and consists of a 'Voluntary on the 100th Psalm.' It is in two sections, and is treated somewhat in the manner of a Choral Prelude. We give the opening of the second section, as showing the construction:

The opening of the Voluntary in D major by John Travers suggests having been written for a building of fine acoustical effect, and is as follows:

The second movement consists of a well-developed double fugue on these subjects:

The following close imitation is worth quoting:

Later the subjects appear in combination with a figure which has gradually developed:

The work would serve admirably as a concluding voluntary.

Our third example is a Voluntary by Dr. Boyce consisting of an introduction and fugue, and although of slender dimensions might well be found useful on occasion. The introduction commences:

Lento. $\text{♩} = 63.$

and this is followed by an interesting little fugue on the subject:

An effective pedal entry is made later on as follows:

ff

The following Handelian phrase concludes the piece:

Slow.

GIRTON COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

An Organ Scholarship, presented by Mr. Sedley Taylor, of the value of £50 per annum for three years, will be offered for competition in June next. Full particulars may be obtained from the Secretary, Miss Clover, Coleby, Grange Road, Cambridge. The offer is made in connection with the organ recently erected in the chapel, and presented by past and present students and other friends of the College.

Mr. Westlake Morgan opened a new organ, by Messrs. Bevington & Sons, at Porth Welsh Congregational Church on March 3. The vocalists were Miss Leah Felissa and and Mr. David Hughes.

On Wednesday, March 16, the new organ for Sparsholt Parish Church was opened by Dr. Varley Roberts, organist of Magdalen College, Oxford. The instrument was built by Mr. Yorston, of London.

SPECIAL LENTEN SERVICES.

Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was sung by the Oratorio Choir in St. John's Church, Ryde (Isle of Wight), on Thursday evening, February 24. The soloists were Mrs. G. W. Fellows, Miss B. Holroyd, Mr. W. Burt, and Mr. W. Wheeler. The performance was under the direction of Mr. W. Brennan Smith, who presided at the organ.

At Bromley Parish Church, on Sunday, February 27, Brahms's 'Requiem' was performed by the choir of the Church. The soloists were Master Leslie Durn (London College for Choristers), and Mr. Bertram H. Latter. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Percy D. Hodsoll (organist of Chislehurst Parish Church), and Mr. F. J. Adams (pianoforte). Mr. Frederic Fertil (organist of Bromley Parish Church) conducted. The same work was performed the following Sunday, at Chislehurst Parish Church, by the combined choirs of Chislehurst and Bromley Parish Churches. The soloists were the same as at Bromley.

On Thursday, March 3, at the Parish Church of the Holy Trinity, Sydenham Park, Maunders's Sacred Cantata 'Olivet to Calvary' was given by the choir, numbering over fifty voices. The soloists were Mr. Arthur Rose, Mr. W. Barrett and Master Austin. Mr. A. J. Larkman presided at the organ.

Maunders's cantata 'Olivet to Calvary' was sung in the Parish Church, St. Mary Cray, Kent, on March 10, under the direction of Mr. C. F. T. Wright, the organist and director of the choir. The soloists were Mr. W. H. Wood, and Mr. E. Barham and Rev. J. Gregory. There was a large congregation, and the performance throughout was very commendable and was much enhanced by the assistance of a few able instrumentalists.

At St. Stephen's, Wandsworth, on Saturday, March 12, an excellent performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' was given before a crowded congregation. The choir was augmented to sixty chosen voices, the soloists being Miss Isabel Tait, Miss Rosalie Sullivan, Mr. George Brierley and Mr. R. E. Miles. The conductor was Mr. W. H. Wheeler, and the accompaniments were played on the fine organ of the church by Mr. Arthur R. Saunders.

A recital of Gounod's 'Redemption' was given in St. Oswald's parish church, Edinburgh, on March 12. The choir, numbering about sixty voices, sang with precision and good articulation, reflecting great credit on the careful training of Mr. Nalborough, organist and choirmaster of the church, who conducted. The Narrator's parts were devotionally rendered, and the singing of the trios and soprano solos by the boys was excellent. An efficient orchestra, mainly consisting of members of the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society, assisted. Mr. Hartley, organist of St. Giles' Cathedral, was at the organ.

Gounod's 'Redemption' was sung by the Bovey Tracey Parish Church Festival Choir on March 14, and also on March 20. The solo parts were well sung by Mr. S. Gale, Mr. W. Harris, Mr. F. Alford, Mr. L. Mardon, Masters W. Prescott and B. Fost, all members of the Parish Church Choir. The choruses were well rendered under the direction of Mr. Melbourne Holman, organist and choir-master, who presided at the organ. There was no conductor.

A performance of Cuthbert Nunn's church cantata, 'Everyman,' was given by the choir of St. Paul's Church, Brentford, on March 16, under the direction of Mr. F. E. Lyne.

Lee Williams's cantata 'Bethany' was given, in the Wesleyan Church, Basingstoke, on March 16, by the Basingstoke Musical Society. The soloists were Miss E. Gilbert, Miss Dasie Avis and Mr. G. Sands. The choir and orchestra, led by Mr. Ivor Rickers, numbered sixty performers. Mr. Frank Pickford ably presided at the organ, and Mrs. Collins at the pianoforte. Mr. Charles Preston conducted an excellent performance.

At St. John's Church, St. Leonard's-on-Sea, on March 16, an admirable performance of Graun's 'Der Tod Jesu' was given by the choir and Musical Society at the special Lenten oratorio service, conducted by the organist, Mr. Leonard O'Connor, to whom great praise is due. The soloists were Miss Viola Salvin, Mr. A. Dynham and Mr. Crouch. Mr. T. S. Guyer (recently appointed to Bexhill Parish Church) accompanied throughout the work on the organ, and a small orchestra assisted. Allegri's famous 'Miserere,' by the church choir only (unaccompanied), preceded the Passion music.

On March 7, the Windsor and Eton Choral Society gave a free performance of 'The Creation' (Parts 1 and 2, and final chorus), with full orchestral accompaniment, in the nave of St. George's Chapel, followed by Brahms's 'Song of Destiny.' The Rev. B. C. Everitt, one of the minor canons (who is the Director of the Society, which was founded in 1841), conducted. The principals were Miss Viola Tree and Messrs. Malcolm Boyle and Eaton Carter, members of the St. George's Choir. During the collection the hymn, 'Praise to the Holiest,' was sung, accompanied on the organ by Sir Walter Parratt. The Dean of Windsor commenced the service with a Collect and the Lord's Prayer, and gave the Blessing at the close.

Maunders's sacred cantata 'Olivet to Calvary' was given in St. John's Church, Felixstowe, on March 17. The church choir was augmented to 100 voices for the occasion by members of the congregation. The accompaniments were expressively played by a small orchestra. The solos were taken by the Rev. A. B. Bennett, assistant priest, and Messrs. Lamb, Leaver and Ruggles. The organist, Mr. T. Percival Powell, conducted.

At the Wesleyan Church, Sherborne, Stainer's sacred cantata 'The daughter of Jairus' was capably rendered by the chapel choir, supplemented by several members of the Abbey choir and an orchestra of about sixty performers. The solos were taken by members of the chapel choir, Miss Elsie Rodman, Mr. Alfred Lowman, and Mr. H. Durrant. The organist, Mr. E. A. Potts, conducted.

Several praiseworthy concerts by church choirs have been given during the month in Glasgow, among these being Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' at Wellington Church, Gaul's 'The holy city' at Queen's Park East Church, and Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' at St. Mary's Cathedral.

The music list for Holy Week and Easter at Westminster Cathedral is remarkable for its variety and scope, and apart from its sacred purpose would prove of high educational value. The finest works of many composers of our Old English School are included, and on Good Friday, Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater,' for eight voices, was sung. The list is well worth studying.

GIOVANNI BATTISTA PERGOLESI.

(BORN: JANUARY 3, 1710. DIED: MARCH 15, 1736.)

The 200th anniversary of the birth of the above short-lived musical genius occurred in January last, but in no country does he appear to have been remembered and, I think I may say without appearing unduly harsh, to the shame of the musical world be it said. Though in England he is principally known by his songs and 'Stabat Mater,' yet in his brief existence he composed a large number of works. Among the former, who with any pretence of musical culture does not know his exquisite 'Tre giorni son che Nina,' of which Bellaine said 'it consists of three lines of poetry and eight of music.' But what music!

Giovanni Battista Pergolesi first saw the light at Jesi, Italy. At an early age he evinced extraordinary musical talent (or rather genius), and he joined the 'Conservatorio dei Poveri di Gesù Cristo' at Naples, where he studied the violin and counterpoint under Durante and Feo. 'San Guglielmo in Aquitania,' 'Sallustia,' 'Amor fa l'uomo cieco,' 'Recimero,' &c., were the works which first caused him to be spoken of, though none of them appear to have met with special favour. Disappointed at this, the young composer resolved to turn his attention to religious compositions, Masses, and sacred cantatas. But his greatest work of the kind, the well-known 'Stabat Mater,' was yet to be written. The glamour of the footlights soon tempted him again, however, and for the San Bartolomeo Theatre at Naples he wrote 'Il Maestro di Musica' and 'Il Geloso Schemisto,' both of which only found favour after his death. 'Lo Frate innamorato,' and 'Il Prigioniero Superbo' followed, both being written in 1732. The year after he gave to the world his theatrical chef d'œuvre. 'La Serva Padrona,' that jewel of pure music of which Bellaine said: 'De ce petit Intermezzo [as such compositions were named at that period] comme d'un germe, d'une goutte de vie, sont nés l'opéra-comique français et l'opéra-bouffe italien. Chacun des deux genres est en quelque sorte une dilution de l'œuvre essentielle de Pergolèse et ce que tous deux ont gagné en étendue, ils l'ont peut-être perdu en profondeur'; and one Duet, of which Rousseau expressed his opinion in the following terms: 'Je le citerai hardiment comme un modèle de chant agréable, d'unité de mélodie, d'harmonie simple, brillant et pure, d'accent de dialogue et de goût, au quel rien ne peut manquer, quand il sera bien rendu, que des auditeurs qui sachent l'entendre et l'estimer ce qu'il vaut.'

It is only possible here to note briefly the great influence Pergolesi had in developing the resources of opéra-buffa. Before his time this form of operatic art had been for a considerable period in vogue, such lesser lights as Mauro, de Falco, Orefici, Faggioli and others having proved more or less successful in their efforts, while those of greater name and fame, such as Leonardo Leo, Nicolò Logroscino, and Alessandro Scarlatti, had given evidence of their ability in this direction. De Villars is of opinion that Pergolesi's recitatives were taken as models by such geniuses as Mozart, Cimarosa, and Rossini. Be this as it may, 'La Serva Padrona' by its brío, wit and refinement shed a new light upon a form of entertainment up till then not apparently remarkable for the last-named quality. Taken to France by a company of wandering singers in 1746, the novelty was a revelation, though meeting with only a succès d'estime; given again under the direction of Bambini, with a specially selected troupe, its success was overwhelming and it served there as model for the French opéra-comique, a class of entertainment unknown in France at that period. When given once more, in 1754, it ran for 190 consecutive nights, a run unheard of before that time. On this occasion it was given shortly after 'Omphale,' a serious opera by Destouches, Grimm declaring it to be superior to any French operatic work yet produced. Hostilities were the result, the public being divided into two parties, one being of course all for their national music, the other upholding the Italian work and being delighted by the innovation. Marmontel, writing of 'La Serva Padrona,' says: 'Until the Italians brought "La Serva Padrona" to France, the French did not understand how comedy and music could be combined.'

Besides the works already mentioned, Pergolesi was commissioned to write a special Mass as an appeal to Heaven to avert a repetition of the appalling earthquake which had just then laid part of Naples in ruins. About the same time he composed other sacred works, among which were a Mass and a superb 'Salve Regina,' one of his loveliest compositions. Most of his energies were however concentrated on a serious opera, 'Olimpiade,' composed for the Argentina Theatre in Rome, which he hoped would give him more fame than any of the other children of his fertile brain. Alas! he was doomed to one of the bitterest disappointments of his short life, for 'Olimpiade' failed hopelessly. The failure had been prophesied at one of the rehearsals by a former fellow-student, a certain Romualdo Duni, who had composed an opera, 'Nerone,' to be given later. 'Listen,' he said, 'the refinement of your opera is above the intelligence of the general public, and its many beauties will pass unobserved and it will not succeed; my opera is, I frankly confess, far inferior to yours, but will be more easily understood and will be more successful'; and he proved a true prophet, for, as we have seen 'Olimpiade' failed, but as Duni said, his 'Nerone' was a great success. Already consumption had undermined Pergolesi's always delicate constitution, and this, combined with the failure of the work on which he had built so much hope, aggravated his condition, and utterly disheartened and discouraged he returned to Loreto, where he occupied the post of Maestro di Cappella. The crowning unhappiness of his existence, however, was yet in store. He loved with all the ardour of his Southern nature one Maria Spinelli, a lady of noble birth, who returned his deep affection, but her family would not consent to the union. Three days were given her in which to choose a husband among her own aristocratic class, and at the end of this period Maria replied that she had decided on a heavenly spouse, and shortly after she retired to the Convent of Santa Chiara. The following year, on March 11, 1735, she died broken-hearted, and her beloved Giovanni conducted the Requiem at her funeral. Completely crushed by the terrible blow, Pergolesi as a last effort of his genius accepted the commission to write his famous 'Stabat Mater' for the Confraternità di Luigi di Palazzo, for which he was to receive the munificent payment of forty-two francs and a half, equivalent to about two pounds sterling; however, as a great concession, payment was made in advance! He journeyed to Pozzuoli, near Naples, to fulfil his task; here he grew weaker and weaker day by day. His former master Feo urged him to suspend work for a short time, but his only reply was 'I have no time to lose, my friend, so the least I can do is to execute this little work, which will be judged by posterity I know not how, and for which I have already been handsomely paid!' As we all know, he succeeded in accomplishing his task.

On March 15, 1736, just a year and five days after the death of his adored Maria, he breathed his last at barely twenty-six years of age. His end resembled strangely that of a later genius—Mozart, who expired almost in the act of writing the last notes of his immortal Requiem.

CLAUDE TREVOR.

Florence, Italy.

PROFESSOR CARL REINECKE.

The death of Carl Heinrich Carsten Reinecke, at Leipsic, on March 10, removes a musician whose work, carried on unobtrusively, has left a strong mark upon the present generation of composers and artists. Although he was a prolific composer, he exerted his greatest influence as a teacher in the position of Professor of Composition and Director of Studies at the Leipsic Conservatoire, an institution with which he was connected for over forty years.

He was born at Altona, on June 23, 1824, and made an early entry into the field of musical activity. At the age of eleven he appeared in public. The few succeeding years he spent in developing his skill as a pianist and acquiring the abilities of an orchestral violin player. His early manhood was largely spent in European tours, and frequent change of residence from one musical centre to another. After a short period of study in Leipsic, where he was privileged with the friendship of Schumann and Mendelssohn, he undertook a concert tour which brought him under the notice of Christian VIII. of Denmark, with the result that he resided at Copenhagen in the King's service from 1846 to 1848. Travels in Italy and a visit to Paris were followed, on his return to Germany, by his appointment as professor of the pianoforte and counterpoint to the Conservatorium of Cologne. His next position was that of musical director at Barmen, from which, after five years, he passed to a similar post at Breslau. In the following year, 1860, he entered upon his long and illustrious connection with the Leipsic Conservatoire as conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts and professor of composition. He continued to appear in public as a pianist, and on two occasions, in 1869 and 1872, visited England, where he played at Philharmonic concerts. In 1895 he resigned his conductorship, and in 1897 became Director of Studies. In 1902 he retired.

As a composer he gave constant expression to his musicianship and artistic ideals, but he cannot be said to have revealed a creative mind of great individuality. His style often betrayed his admiration for the works of Schumann and Mendelssohn, and advanced but little beyond their school. Considerable popularity has been enjoyed by his cantatas for female voices and a number of his pianoforte pieces. He occasionally essayed the larger forms and wrote operas, Masses, concertos and symphonies. An example of his art that concealed science as well as itself is seen in his Twelve Canons for ladies' voices, which are published in Novello's series. He was enormously active as a musical editor.

He will be remembered as a great educational worker; his compositions are worthy of regard in so much as they illustrate by example his teaching of aesthetic principles. In many countries his memory will be cherished by musicians who came under his inspiring influence. He was buried on March 13, at Leipsic.

MR. JAMES BROWN, MUS. BAC.

The appointment of this capable musician to the conductorship of the Dulwich Philharmonic Society (in the place of Mr. Arthur Fagge, who recently resigned), marks a step in a useful career. A short sketch of Mr. Brown's life and musical doings will prove interesting to many friends at this juncture.

Mr. Brown was born in London in 1863. He was brought up at Farnham, Surrey, where his father was organist, and a strong advocate of the Tonic Sol-fa Method. Young Brown began music very early, singing in the choir, and playing violin, cornet, alto trombone, &c., as required. At about fourteen years of age he was playing the organ at a village church, though as yet unable to reach the pedal board. At sixteen he was organist at the Military Church, Aldershot, and at seventeen and a-half he left home to be organist near Newbury, Berkshire. Five years later he was appointed organist at All Saints' Parish Church, Isleworth, but he gave up the organ a few years later.

Meanwhile he had become increasingly engrossed in the technique of orchestral and choral training and conducting. This seemed to him to be the particular thing he was 'cut out for,' at the same time the most useful and necessary to the world in the present stage of its musical development. Among many classes for instrumental and vocal tuition, which have served him as a sort of experimental laboratory, he singles out the school orchestra and chorus at the High School for Welsh Girls, Ashford, Middlesex, where for over twenty years he has been visiting music-master. He also conducted musical societies at Isleworth, Putney, Staines, Richmond, &c. At the last-named, he has during recent years directed performances of Israel and Acis (Handel), Christmas Oratorio, &c. (Bach), Requiem and Triumphal (Brahms), Phauidrig Crohoore (Stanford), Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, &c. (Parry), Gerontius (Elgar), and Everyman (Walford Davies). He was a keen Wagnerian long before the craze, and he made the Bayreuth pilgrimage in 1888 and twice subsequently. He took his Cambridge Mus. Bac. in 1896.

When August Wilhelmj came to London he went to him as a violin pupil, and afterwards collaborated with him in the production of 'A Modern School for the Violin,' in twelve books (Novello).

The Dulwich Philharmonic Society, to which he has been appointed conductor, has a choir of 260, with full orchestra, and gives five concerts each season at the Crystal Palace Concert Room, which will seat 3,000 in the auditorium. Mr. Brown has now a fine opportunity to exhibit his skill in choral technique. We shall look forward to the results.

THE LATE MR. F. G. EDWARDS'S LIBRARY.

The sale of the library of the late Mr. F. G. Edwards (Editor of the Musical Times from 1897 until December, 1909), by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson, will take place at 47, Leicester Square, on April 18. The catalogue includes:

A series of letters from Mendelssohn to his publisher, having reference to the publication and production of 'Elijah.' 'Proceedings of the Musical Association' from the commencement, 1874, to 1909. Fétis's 'Biographie Universelle des Musiciens' with the supplement, 10 vols. in 5, 1873-8. Sir J. Hawkins's 'General History of the Science and Practice of Music,' 3 vols., 1875. Dr. Burney's 'History of Music,' plates by Bartolozzi. Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' vocal score, proof copy, with some alterations in Mendelssohn's own hand, vide note inside cover. 'The Fitzwilliam Virginal Book,' edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland and W. Barclay Squire; half-morocco. Eighteen volumes of Bach Society works. Early printed 'Motets de diversi Eccellentissimi Autori,' Venetia, 1645. G. Casati's 'Sacri Concerti,' Venetia, 1646. M. Cazzati, 'Mottetti,' 1647 to 1648. Interesting autograph letters of Dvorák, Goss, G. A. Macfarren, Louis Spohr, Costa, S. S. Wesley, Charles Dickens, C. Kemble, Jenny Lind, Moscheles, Bishop, &c. A large and highly interesting lot of Cuttings, Memoranda, Programmes, Books of Words, Letters, &c., relating to the various articles written by the late Mr. Edwards.

When, something like eighty or ninety years ago, the quadrille began to usurp the place of the country dance in the ball-room, and when, with the waltz, they finally extinguished it, neither of the two new-fashioned dances had any particular influence on the rustic mind, or the rustic legs.

The countryman danced the dances with which his father, mother and other forbears amused themselves, and left the newfangled ones to his betters. The country dance was born of the people, and up to recent years has always been used by them. Etymologists have tried to give it a more genteel birth by deriving the word from contre danse, but evidence is against them. It is well known by all who penetrate into the inner circles of country life that traditional dances exist much in the same way that traditional folk-music does.

Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, having brought to light many interesting Morris dances, and having apparently exhausted Somerset of its folk-song, has turned his attention to collecting these quaint dances, and gives to the public the results of his 'bag.'

As all know, who have made any study of the subject, it was John Playford who, in Puritanical times, first published books of English country dances. His work, originally named 'The English Dancing Master,' was issued in 1650, and in the eighteen or more editions, which ran from that time to 1728, there are directions given for the dances that show that the 17th century country dance was a far less stately function than it afterwards became. Eccentricity of movement, clapping of hands, 'acting the cobbler,'—whatever that may be—kissing your partner, and other ladies, were part of the antics which at a later period shocked the Masters of the Ceremonies of places like Bath, Cheltenham, and Tonbridge. Revised figures then became a necessity. In rustic society, where people met to thoroughly enjoy themselves, such revisions were not observed—if Giles got a hearty slap on the face for his gallantry it was all part of the fun.

The dances of which Mr. Sharp gives examples contain no such grotesquenesses, but are sober country dances, not dependent on such matters.

In the interesting remarks contained within the small book describing the dance figures, Mr. Sharp makes pertinent strictures upon the generally accepted belief that England never had any national dance or dances. This belief, based upon the very superficial knowledge of some who have written on the subject, is an exploded idea and could never have been held by any one conversant with our early literature, which so fully proves the existence and practise of popular dances.

The vast quantity of English musical publications from the middle of the 17th century down to 1830, or thereabouts, show that country dance books were in great demand, and yearly sets were issued by practically every English music publisher. The jig and the hornpipe were also in great vogue, not only in Ireland and Scotland, but in England as well. As before said, the quadrille and the waltz, not to mention the polka, displaced, in society, the English country dance and its French companion, the minuet.

The personal research of Mr. Sharp and others has proved that the rustic dance still lingers, traditionally, apart from any book or teaching, and it is quite as well that such should be recorded before modern usages have totally eliminated them.

We do not quite know whether Mr. Sharp claims that the airs attached to the dances he publishes are contemporary. If he does, then some of the dances cannot be of great age, for it was only about 1840-5 that the French 'Malbrouk' was turned into 'We won't go home till morning,' and 'Pop goes the weasel' was, if we remember rightly, an importation from America in the late fifties. As in the case of Morris dancing, the truth is that while the dance itself, in general arrangement and step, may be old, the country fiddler or other player who provided the music would use any tune that would fit the dance and was a general favourite.

Thus in looking through the tunes that form Mr. Sharp's collection, we find most are apparently traditional versions of published country dances and vocal airs of very varied degrees of antiquity. 'Brighton Camp' is, of course, the alternate name for 'The girl I left behind me,' 'The Butterfly' seems to be a rather vague remembrance of Thomas Haynes Bayly's song 'I'd be a butterfly,' the popularity of which caused the poet to be ever afterwards named 'Butterfly Bayly.' 'The bonnet so blue' equally suggests itself to be a very imperfect remembrance of Alexander Lee's song 'Hurrah for the bonnets of blue,' which, with 'I'd be a butterfly,' was a great favourite in the second and third decades of the 19th century. 'The flowers of Edinburgh' is still a well-known dance air and was originally a song, and this may also be said of 'Haste to the wedding.'

It is interesting to compare Mr. Sharp's 'Triumph,' 'Tink-a-tink,' and 'Speed the plough' with the old published copies bearing those names as dances which held favour in the ball-rooms for half a century. 'Tink-a-tink' was originally a song in Kelly's 'Blue Beard,' and 'Speed the plough' was imported into Morton's play of that name (1798), and changed its first name into that of the play when it began to be printed. 'Nancy's fancy' is a curious survival of an air of greater antiquity. The tune first appeared about 1750, and was afterwards named the 'Wedding ring.'

There is a tempting maze into which the musical antiquary might venture in regard to the other tunes, but enough has been said. While we welcome the books as throwing light upon the part which tradition plays with melodies, we may say that the notation of the airs as originally published, together with the dancing directions to them, found in contemporary works, would have added great interest to the work.

Mr. Sharp and Mr. Macilwaine have added two more books to their Morris dances. The new sets are numbered III. and IV. Some of the airs are repeated in the country dance collections. There is a pretty version of the old favourite 'Jockie to the fair,' and the 'Double Set Back' suggests a hornpipe of about that time (the end of the 18th century), when hornpipes were in so much favour.

The Organ. By Percy C. Buck.

There have been compiled many books on this important subject, which are necessarily meagre on account of limit of space and other causes, and the time was ripe for the issue of a work combining all that was good in them, together with the outcome of modern practice and experience. Such a work has been given us by the accomplished Harrow music-master. The original exercises are not only well graded in point of difficulty, but possess the important characteristic of being good and interesting as music. It is easy to see that the author has gained his experience from the purest possible sources, and the reflection of this in the examples given must be productive of the happiest results in the work of those who are wise enough to use the book.

If we must cavil at anything, it would be with Dr. Buck's suggestions in the chapter on Specification. We should not use one particular combination he mentions, viz.: 8-ft. and 4-ft. flutes and piccolo, as to our ear the piccolo would overbalance the other stops. We do not object to the doubling of notes in the manner illustrated, but possibly that may be from want of thought. We are quite open to conviction, however, and recognise that the author has at least suggested a matter upon which something might be said for and against. We have, however, yet to be convinced that mixtures, judiciously scaled and voiced, should not form part of the tonal scheme. We should have preferred a more elementary section at the commencement, and we also feel that a large selection of pedal exercises, with simultaneous passages for the hands, would have been advisable. But with the Organ Primer by Sir J. Stainer, Best's Pedal Studies, and Dr. Buck's admirable book, no student can fail to succeed. Dr. Buck's modest dedication of the work to Sir Walter Parratt only increases our debt of gratitude to him for having brought such an influence within reach of all.

VIOLIN AND PIANOFORTE.

Three Pieces for Violin and Pianoforte (Op. 59). By Richard Wickenhauser.

Cavatina in G. By Ernest Newton.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Three pieces for violin and pianoforte, by Richard Wickenhauser, are not mere bagatelles; and they are cast in a mould which cannot be termed commonplace. No. 1 is entitled 'Reverie.' Somehow a reverie on the violin seems inevitably to suggest a warm, glowing theme on the G string, pregnant with deep, even sombre thoughts; but the composer gives us here a lighter melody—suggesting tenderness—in a higher register, on the E string mostly, and con sordino. The middle episode is even skittish, reminding one somewhat of a Norwegian hillside dance, with its lively two-beat rhythm, and dancing semiquavers. No. 2 is a 'Menuet.' It almost seems a sacrilege too ruthlessly to bring a Menuet 'up-to-date.' The very title throws us back to the days of long ago, when dainty dresses, dainty steps, dainty curseys and dainty music gave a charm to the Menuet which we, in this bustling matter-of-fact century may sigh for, but can never hope to see revived. Mr. Wickenhauser's Menuet would admirably serve to demonstrate the advancement of ideas and the possibilities of a Menuet in its development downwards (or should we say upwards?) from the time of Lully. No. 3 'Adagio,' is in a more sombre mood than either of the preceding. In fact it appeals to us much more as a Reverie, an Elegy, or a Rhapsody. Well played, all three pieces should prove effective, and they are worthy of the study they require.

A 'Cavatina,' by Ernest Newton, has been arranged by the composer in two new garbs, viz., for violoncello and pianoforte; and for violin, violoncello and pianoforte ensemble. Both arrangements are in every respect highly satisfactory.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

A Miniature Characteristic Suite. For flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. By Joseph Holbrooke. Op. 33b.

[Rudall, Carte & Co.]

There is an unexpected and welcome daintiness in this example of Mr. Holbrooke's writing for wind instruments of the normal type, which is perhaps partly explained in the fact that the work was written thirteen years ago. Its five movements, entitled 'In the fields,' 'A joyous moment,' 'Minuet,' 'A lament' and 'Une fête,' are successfully characterized, delicately scored and neatly rhythmic. The Minuet is, more or less, a fugue. If Mr. Holbrooke is desirous of putting his family of saxophones to good use he should write for them a work of this description.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Innere Stimmen. Wanderbilder. By Adolf Jensen.

Sechs Klavierstücke. By Max Bruch. Op. 12.

Kinder des Südens. By Alexander von Fieltz. Op. 7.

Namenlose Blätter. By Hans Sitt. Op. 10.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

A number of artistically conceived compositions are to be found in this collection. Those by Jensen and Bruch, though written years since, are by no means widely known, and it is fitting that pianists should be reminded of their existence. Bruch's pieces, as one would expect, are such that only an earnest minded musician could have written them. The three pieces entitled 'Kinder des Südens' are unpretentious; with the exception of the first they are well-planned and attractive in melody and harmonies. Sitt's ten 'nameless leaves' embody some charming ideas which are well worked out. These five volumes of pianoforte pieces impose few difficulties beyond the executive powers of the average junior student, and suggest a variant to the excellent but somewhat one-sided routine of Gurliitt, easy Haydn and Beethoven Op. 49.

An easy setting of the Te Deum, in chant form. By John J. Jones.

[Weekes & Co.]

This straightforward and, on the whole, well-written setting should become popular where simplicity is necessary. There are certainly some passages which seem familiar, and no doubt on that account would help towards a congregational rendering. Variety is effectively introduced by unison passages and change of rhythm.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE 'MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—May I point out the hitherto unnoticed fact that Dr. Arne, who was a Catholic, and who took the name of Augustine at Confirmation, from St. Augustine, Apostle of England, was organist of the Sardinian Embassy Chapel in Duke Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and composed two Masses, one for three voices, and the other for four voices, for this chapel. His successor as organist of this same Catholic chapel was Samuel Webbe. It will not be amiss to add that on the day on which Arne's sister, Mrs. Cibber, was borne to Westminster Abbey, a notice appeared on the doors of Lincoln's Inn Fields Chapel requesting the prayers of the Catholic congregation for 'the soul of Mrs. Susanna Maria Cibber.'

Your faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN-FLOOD.

Obituary.

DR. W. B. GILBERT.

We regret to record the death of Dr. Gilbert on March 2, at his residence, 12, Frenchay Road, Oxford. Born in 1829, he was the oldest living Oxford graduate in Music, and was in many respects a very remarkable man. He knew personally six Oxford professors of music—Dr. Crotch, Sir Henry Bishop, Ouseley, Stainer, Parry, and the present professor, Sir W. Parratt. He was a pupil of S. S. Wesley for organ-playing, and of Sir H. Bishop for orchestration. He was also one of the founders of the (now) Royal College of Organists, and was one of the first to lecture at that institution on 'Organ-playing.' Only a short time ago the council, recognising his excellent life-long work, made him one of the Vice-presidents of the College. Though Dr. Gilbert composed at least two oratorios as well as anthems and services, yet he is perhaps best known by his hymn-tune 'Maidstone,' to 'Pleasant are Thy courts above,' which is exceedingly popular. His tunes 'Tregarthen' and 'Thanks-giving' are also thoroughly excellent, and full of genuine musical feeling. Dr. Gilbert spent a great part of his life in America, but after his retirement came to reside in Oxford. The first part of the funeral service was held in the University Church, Dr. Iliffe presiding at the organ, while the choral portions were excellently rendered by the choir, which was augmented by several personal friends of the deceased gentleman. Many very beautiful wreaths were sent, including one 'With sincere sympathy and regret' from the council of the Royal College of Organists. The interment took place in Wolvercote Cemetery (North Oxford).

MUSIC IN RELATION TO OTHER ARTS.

BY H. WALFORD DAVIES.

At the third lecture, Dr. Davies discussed the resemblances which music bears to the visual arts, to those of gesture, painting, sculpture, and architecture; and finally he dwelt upon the combination of the arts in music-drama. He asked his audience to bear in mind the fundamental likeness of them all in their common human content already mentioned in the first lecture; then, remembering this profound resemblance, he proceeded to compare the methods of the arts of gesture with those of music.

Gesture, he said, is peculiarly linked to music in that it is the one appeal to the eye which involves movement. It uses duration as a dimension, just as music does; hence, in signs and sounds respectively, they hold and use the vast field of rhythmic demonstration in common. The very sound of a dance-rhythm prompts movement of feet or hands; and though association of idea has of course been apt to emphasise their relation, as in the ball-room, yet the likeness of rhythmic gesture and rhythmic sound is innate and permanent. The art of dancing to music other than conventional dance-music has been attempted with much approval recently. There is nothing indeed to prevent the translation of some of Beethoven's inimitably vivacious Scherzi into gesture; except perhaps that the best wine has, in this case, been set on first, and the ethereal gesture of sonata or symphony (when appreciated) is, the lecturer thought, superior to the visible gesture of the most irreproachable set of human arms and legs. Every one will have noticed, he continued, that in emphatic speech gesture and tone of voice are frequently used to reinforce each other. He pointed out that there are two kinds of expressive gestures which may be styled indicative and illustrative. Thus a child will indicate the magnitude of its love by extending its arms, measuring out its emotion by the yard. Similarly an orchestral conductor instinctively spreads his arms for a broad, generous tone, and brings them together when he mutely entreats unimaginative performers for a diminuendo. A primitive orator will emphasise each accent with a pump-handle movement of the arm. These are all indicative gestures, which, as a moment's thought will reveal, are intimately analogous to rhythmic and dynamic devices of music. Illustrative gestures are familiar to every one. They are often used with quite comic as well as graphic effect. They are useful in ordinary speech and suggestive on the stage. Their strict counterpart in music is to be found in the illustrative sounds which are so frequently used by the great masters for suggestive purposes, often in the course of serious works—such as imitations of birds' songs, typical animal noises, spinning wheels and the like. But it may escape notice that there is a subtler illustrative music possible, which suggests not natural sounds but natural sights. As in action one may illustrate a journey upstairs by upward gesture, and perhaps, to go further, suggest a spiral staircase by an upward circular movement of the hand; so, since music can to some extent suggest both shape and direction, it is possible (as the lecturer showed at the pianoforte) to illustrate ascent of a ladder by steps, or even of a spiral staircase by sinuous scale-passages, though this illustration had perhaps more suggestive charm than exactitude.

Further it was shown that not only gesture but pose, or posture, has its telling musical counterpart. Thus tightly-clenched fists and firmly set facial muscles indicate states of emotional tension such as determination, defiance, resolve. In like manner a persistent note or chord, or series of notes and chords, will convey this tension in music. No fugue is considered complete unless a few bars of purposeful and persistent pedal appear. A splendid instance of this tension is to be found in the music with which Strauss illustrates Don Quixote's despairing return after defeat. The lecturer knew few, if any, more heartrending pages in all music. In the opening bars of the 'Choral Symphony' Beethoven bids his hearers stand still, as it were, before a mighty enterprise. Possibly Wagner has emulated him in his impressive device at the opening of the 'Ring.'

Music's relation with the still arts was next examined. No one can doubt its picturesque, statuesque, architectural qualities. The lecturer deplored that there is not some authoritative treatise on so great a subject.

He first asked his hearers to remember that pictures and plastic arts were not concerned with materials and objects, but with the appearances of materials and objects to the eye. He reminded them of the conclusions arrived at in the first lecture as to the analogies of light and sound (see February issue, p. 99), and then led them a step further by pointing out that the four common properties or attributes of light and sound as artistic media are not by any means on equal terms. That which for want of a better term was called Pitch, is the distinctive and all-important attribute in both cases. Intensity, Location, and Duration—i.e., their strong or weak, near or far, long or short—are held in common with all else in the world. These three, of course, are essential, as Space and Time themselves are essential; they all may be matters of life and death to mortal man, to whom light or sound can be overpoweringly near, or violently strong, even to the point of annihilation. But the unique phenomena which we speak of as colours in light and harmonies in sound, and the unique perception of them through human senses—Colour seen and Harmony heard, these, said the lecturer, are comparable with nothing in the whole universe (as far as we can perceive), except with each other. Pictures and music design to present colour and harmony in like ways, and the analogy is as far-reaching as it is delicate.

To define this analogy, the lecturer desired the audience to imagine a picture of the simplest kind before them which had a maximum of colour-appeal and a minimum of any detail that could suggest objects and awaken association of ideas. Imagine, he said, a plain sunset over the sea, or a moonrise over a lake, with no design of line discernible, no church, no cedar tree, or grave-stone in the foreground. Let there be variety of light and shade; there may perhaps be vague shapes and forms in the clouds that add delight; but the interest of detail should be reduced to a minimum, that of colour raised to a maximum. Now let a full chord on a perfect orchestra be imagined. It should be pianissimo for the sake of the analogy, since the mere physical nearness and excitation of a fortissimo chord is apt to absorb the hearer's powers and disturb contemplation. It should be a rich chord of many notes, but distant as the landscape, and euphonious, and altogether as bearable. Link these two, sunset picture and orchestral chord, in the mind. There is detail of colour harmoniously blended in both, but in the picture no diverting detail of line, in the chord no charm of melodic rise or fall. Both are motionless, and the observing eye and ear must remain still too. To put both on precisely equal terms, let them present themselves to eye and ear respectively for exactly two minutes. Both eye and ear may deliberately vary the impression during that time by directing their attention first to one point, then to another. Here it may be seen that the absolute analogue to a picture is not a contemplative movement, but a sustained chord, that may be full, as is the picture, of recognizable varieties of colour—muted strings here, a plaintive oboe there, an insistent horn elsewhere—to which the mind can direct the ear's detailed attention. The power of the ear to detect, analyse and separately contemplate component parts of a chord is still very limited. A large number of people seem colour-deaf. But, the lecturer pointed out, in this connection Debussy's orchestral methods in his cloud and sea-pieces are highly significant. He may be a historic figure like Monteverde, in that he is revealing to musicians new possibilities of a chord, that is of the merest monosyllable in our mighty language.

From this new starting-point the lecturer indicated the divergences of music and painting. It may be seen that the moment a composer uses his prerogative of movement in the chord-picture, the artist is left far behind, unable to make his water sparkle or his sun to rise or set. Music leaps ahead with its powers of crescendo, diminuendi, accelerandi, rallentandi, into a vitality unknown to the still arts except by suggestion, and with its free use of rhythmic and dynamic device in duration, it attains a power to depict life which in visual arts is now dimly hinted at in the crude and probably despised devices of the cinematograph.

The still arts have, however, their great compensation in their own direction. The arts of the eye, it will be noticed, use space much as the arts of the ear use time. The irrevocable nature of time to human creatures gives a peculiar urgency to music, as indeed to any utterance in which duration has a designedly conspicuous part. There is no turning back and no exact knowledge of what is ahead, only a relentless moving forward; and the exercise of memory and anticipation are required. But in the still arts there is a contemplative leisure unknown to aural arts. This is due to the power of the eye to gaze to and fro, backward as well as forward in space. There is obviously no moving backward in time, except by the exercise of the faculty of memory. Just as the musician leaps into a splendid activity of rhythm and intensity which a painter can only simulate or faintly suggest, so on the other hand the painter can rise in his art to a leisurely stillness of contemplation which the former can only simulate, except by the held-chord process imagined above. Yet both music and painting can, after all, suggest both stillness and movement; and the fact that music can depict stillness at all, even in its limited way, immensely increases its power to be picturesque. From a still chord, melodious forms may arise in comparative stillness, and, starting from this point, the whole field of vital harmonic, dynamic and rhythmic utterance is before us. If any lover of music desires to attain complete appreciation of the art at its full rush of arduous activity, let him study chords in stillness. Chord perception gives the true mastery to the ear—not the study of harmony in a book, but the true relating of living chords to each other by the ear. The lecturer proceeded to show at the pianoforte how music moved away from the other arts most of all in its power of harmonic device. He pointed out that in the mysterious interest man finds in the perception of varied harmony in light and harmony in sound, the ear and music have so utterly outstripped the eye and painting as practically to have a whole field of activity to themselves. There is no parallel elsewhere to the amazing power of the educated ear to distinguish not only a multitude of notes in succession, but to mentally connect and simultaneously enjoy a rapid succession of different chords or notes in combination, and even to memorize them for subsequent relation to chords yet to be heard.* A colour organ was once invented, which, the lecturer understood, presented connected colours to the eye as chords to the ear. It naturally could not succeed till the eye attained the ear's skill to detect, analyse and relate successive colours. And even then it must be recognised that colour has not the linguistic significance of sound. We do not express ourselves in changing colour, except by blushing and turning pale, and this is a very limited repertoire. We do express ourselves by a most remarkable repertoire of sounds. And though it is clearly an error to define the immensely enlarged resources of harmony and melody as a mere extension of the expressive vocal utterances of man, the broad fact remains that sound, whether it be a euphonious chord or a cacophonous shout, is an expressive medium in a sense in which colour is not.

Dr. Davies, in summing up, hoped he had made it clear that music has profound relations with the still arts, which by analogy could be helpful to the appreciation of both, and which are destined to become more significant as the art progresses; that music at present explores a limitless field of harmonic enterprise alone; that yet the profoundest analogy of all between the arts of sight and sound lay in this very field; that they diverge the widest in methods, in that music is apt to express action and the still arts are apt to express contemplation, but that even these characteristics are to some extent shared by them.

The appeal of line to the eye and melodic line to the ear, together with the common appeal by repetition, form the chief links between music and architecture, and justify to some extent the definition of certain stately symphonic movements as cathedrals in sound. A church spire and the pointed arch are symbols in still art of aspiration; and in this connection the interesting and subtle analogies between upward line and upward gesture, upward vocal inflection and upward melodic design should be noted.

What conclusions, the lecturer asked, can appropriately be drawn from the considerations to which he had directed attention during these lectures? So far as he could see, the fitting suggestion or illustration of one art in terms of another is all to the good, has real explanatory value, and a delight quite its own—and this either separately by suggestion, as is the case in programme-music; or in combination, as in song and incidental music: provided always that the combined appeals start no conflicting issues, as though two separate beings held forth at the same moment. It seemed broadly true that two or more sense-impressions may well be brought to bear upon us at the same moment, but not two lines of thought. Again, it is obviously an advantage that of two simultaneous appeals one should address itself to the eye and one to the ear. This is well borne out by the standing difficulty of two appeals to the ear in the obvious instance of words and music. In this case the ideal surely is that, by whatever means, they should always be made to lie within one line of thought—in fact they should constitute one appeal to the mind. This may be brought about by identity of design or by alternation of interest, but overlapping of two designs or overlapping of two interests tends to a fatal confusion.

This confusion is notorious in the sung-drama. In the attempt to compromise two splendid arts, speech loses its dramatic veracity in order that it may become song; and in so far as that dramatic veracity is restored, it loses its splendour as song. And, after all, what is gained by the convention of opera? Why this laborious superimposition? When many arts are combined they can inevitably only have their fraction of the intelligent man's unit of attention. Is it a perceiving humanity that desires to combine all in one gargantuan art-feast? Are these 'feasts of reason and flows of soul' a stupendous success? The lecturer admitted that to him they bore a dark resemblance to the overloaded dinner-table; and they certainly violate one art in a laudable attempt to extend the resources of another. The prophets of opera prophesy falsely and at present the people seemed to love to have it so. To Dr. Davies, all seems to point to a new kind of music-drama which will quite naturally use voices—perhaps somewhat as a Greek chorus—as well as a full orchestra, off the stage, except when singing on the stage forms a consistent dramatic factor. He said that he knew no more splendid advocate of the abandonment of operatic convention than Wagner himself. The Preislied and Siegfried's Forging Song alone, by their musical inspiration and fine veracity to the drama, should make it clear how desirable is the unbroken dramatic consistency which they chance to possess to so high a degree. The music-drama that will supersede grand opera will never ignore so essential a point and will work as strenuously, perhaps as long, but certainly not as fruitlessly as grand opera has worked (and not, as it were, down a cul de sac) at the clearly possible union between fine music and fine drama, between the arts of sight and sound, arts which may be brought to bear so vitally upon each other, to the elucidation of both. If all this be true, then the sung drama, with its attendant contortions and unnatural ways, must ultimately cease to violate drama and handicap music. Hero and heroine will no longer scream high notes into each other's faces when making love; the dramatis personæ in general will no longer eat singing, order milk-punch in song, make love and quarrel singing, die at great length elaborately singing. He ventured to predict that the best lovers of music and drama will most insist that these absurd abuses of two splendid arts have out-stayed their welcome by many years and should be relegated to their appropriate sphere—comic opera, or to that form of opera in which the actors are not human beings but symbolic creatures or visitants from some other planet who may presumably do what they like. It may be advocated that in such an ideally conceived work as Wagner's 'Ring,' this is the case; that the players are not real but symbolical, and that their unreal behaviour in perpetual song is therefore immaterial. It may even be contended that since song is idealized speech and Wotan an idealized human, nothing could be more fitting than that he should perpetually pace the stagesinging. This seems plausible, and it is doubtless true that the further we move from known reality, the less incongruous any unreality will seem. But are not the characters in the 'Ring' real? That they are must surely be admitted, even by their best admirers. Their sentiments are real; their actions are real (if they act well); moreover, the music they sing is real. Nowhere, it would seem, is reality more urgent than in the presentation of the ideal. When Art ceases to be in the highest sense real, we are estranged. This brings the mind back to the common distinction between Art and Nature, which was deprecated at the outset of these inquiries. It is a convenient but misleading division. The true opposite of natural is unnatural, not artificial. In the same way, the true opposite of real is unreal, not ideal. In that the sung drama is ideal, it is good; in that it is unreal, it is doomed. It will be slow to go, for it has proved and still proves an attractive, sumptuous, costly form of folly. If there are two ways in any art, and one is manifestly above the other—in veracity, in simplicity, in fitness, in mental enlightenment, in any of the qualities which men agree to think desirable, then it is hard to doubt that the way of artistic progress will lie in the preference of the better style.

Music in relation not only to other arts but to life itself, cannot in the end fall short of the great task of linking up the real in this good life with the highest ideal within the scope of its expression and imagination. The Real which is here, and now, may be very imperfect. The Ideal may be there, far remote, and splendidly perfect. Yet both are natural; and there is a road from one to the other with which all men, especially artists, are very much concerned.

ITALIAN SINGING TEACHING.

In the Lombardia, a Milanese newspaper, recently, two articles appeared, signed 'R. C.' (Romeo Carugati), of which sundry remarks and statements must be of interest to singers, and teachers of singers especially. Mr. Carugati's experiences and deductions are certainly amusing and deplorable, and not a little instructive. He sheds a lurid light on the conditions of voice-training prevailing, to an extent at any rate, at Milan, and the note of warning he sounds should not be left unheeded. The principal title of his articles is: 'The Market of Voices, and some of the sub-titles are significant; 'The destroyers of the uvula,' 'Metodi eccentrici d'insegnamento,' 'Il mercato (market) in decadenza,' 'The influx of foreigners,' 'Managers and economy.' 'We have voices in Italy,' begins the writer—'our language itself is music, but we lack lyrical artists owing to the facility of singing and the little studying singers do. Foreigners setting out for a career on the stage submit to a proper vocal and histrionic education. Their voices are not always excellent, but they make up for it by understanding how to represent character.' As examples are quoted, with terse criticism, Manuel, Renaud and Van Dyck. Those who knew these artists in their prime may differ as to Mr. Carugati's valuation of their voices, while agreeing that they are excellent actors. But in Germany and in this country Mr. Charles Manners's frequent utterances on the subject will be remembered: the complaint is general and very strong that most singers have to be accepted by managers with very deficient training either as to voice or in acting by sheer necessity. But as a rule they are a good deal more sober in their hopes than the Italians, of whom the writer says that many, believing they have gold in their throats, count upon achieving success in the following manner: 'six months study, début at a principal or a provincial theatre, recognition by Press and public, fame in the second season, £2,000 in the second year in America.' Mr. Carugati is quite right when he remarks that modern composers require singers of great ability, else they spoil their voices by high notes, tonal acrobatics or intentional hardness of tone. That the singer who has acquired thoroughly the method of the bel canto is best fitted for modern music is the opinion of many excellent judges, including Wagner himself, and such prominent conductors as Weingartner and the late Mr. Zumpe. Mr. Carugati writes: 'Formerly a tenor was a tenor and a soprano a soprano, and we had contraltos. Nowadays a tenor is a light tenor, or a lyrical or a forced lyrical tenor, or a dramatic tenor, and the sopranos specialize likewise. The dramatic soprano of the old répertoire is scarce, and we have but one contralto. The old, robust voices, capable of resistance and all-powerful are no more, and the study of the bel canto, the Italian bel canto, does not exist any more. Exceptions are very rare. And why is this so? Because the intensity of life in our days fosters the desire for rapid enjoyment, for creature-comforts, and the exploitation of human stupidity is the best means to acquire riches. Thus a sect of teachers have sprung up who give themselves diplomas and have a supply of very great confidence in their own vocal success. They work and shout about tone with extraordinary fuss and transform in four months a howler into a screaming singer. There are 200 or more teachers of singing in Milan; about ten of them deserve that name and they are, perhaps, not the best known. We have as singing-masters old artists who sometimes teach more than the quality of the defects which remained at their retirement from the stage, players of the oboe and the big drum, doctors, lawyers, second-class singers, income-tax collectors, prompters and others. Of course there are praiseworthy exceptions. The competition is the greatest possible. Those especially who come with illusions from abroad are confronted by people ready to make the most wonderful promises of easy and speedy success. The poor students pass from master to master, and the final result is complete loss of voice.' Mr. Carugati quotes an episode from a novel 'Otello,' by Galleria, describing some methods. 'These things,' he says, 'are not invented. One master put a wooden triangle with a toothed rim in the mouths of his pupils like a gag, and then made them work off all vowels, in tones and semi-tones, like amorous cats and dogs, to make the voice stick to the palate, as he explained. Another bought a number of old quartos, each weighing 3 kilograms, and placed one after another on the body of the pupil flat on the floor, making him shout all the while. Yet another takes each new student in a darkened room, lights a candle, and places it beside a broken death's head, on a table. The student is instructed in his general duties as a man or woman, and has to swear on an old Bible that he or she will never reveal the method of the master. After that he explains the functions of the vocal chords, &c., and the student can choose to be trained as a tenor or bass, soprano or contralto.' Mr. Carugati suggests that the State should take measures to hinder the destruction of voices.

He estimates that 10 per cent. of Italian singers succeed in getting a position, and 30 per cent. of foreigners. The latter invade the Italian stage in increasing numbers. They are generally better educated. The mental horizon of opera singers the Italian writer finds very restricted. His experience is that even persons of a higher social grade, after having been some time on the stage, sink to the level of the working-class who frequent the gallery. The foreigners find themselves a favourable public. Many spend money for the fight, and in the world of the stage, where honesty is like coin out of date, money is a great help for men. Impresarios who wish to economise prefer an elegant foreign singer with the manners of a gentleman and with a well-filled purse. The lady artist knows how to make réclame for herself and the company. But sad and painful cases occur now and then. Some facts are then related and commented upon in a manner unfavourable to Italy and connected with the 'Maffon' and 'Black Hand.' The reader of these articles probably will think the picture painted is black enough, and even if these things are only black spots on a fair fame they should be removed.

OPERATIC FESTIVAL IN EDINBURGH.

PRODUCTION OF WAGNER'S 'RING OF THE NIBELUNG.'

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Beginning on February 28 and extending over a fortnight, Herr Ernst Denhof, in conjunction with the Carl Rosa Opera Company, gave performances in the King's Theatre of two complete cycles of Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelung.' For several months a frequent topic of conversation in musical circles was whether or not Herr Denhof would be successful in his efforts to procure for Edinburgh the honour of giving for the first time in this country, outside of London, complete performances of Wagner's great music-drama. Much gratification was felt when the announcement was made that the measure of support to the scheme was sufficient to warrant Herr Denhof carrying out his onerous undertaking. Lectures on the story of the 'Ring,' with musical illustrations, have been given by Professor Niecks, Dr. Otto Schlapp, and Mr. Albert B. Bach, and a few weeks ago a highly interesting series of articles on the subject appeared in the 'Scotsman.'

Herr Denhof was fortunate in securing the services of Hofkapellmeister Michael Balling, the eminent Wagnerian conductor, who on the recommendation of Dr. Richter conducted the performances of the 'Ring' in Bayreuth last season. The orchestration was supplied by the Scottish Orchestra, augmented to 82 performers by members of the Covent Garden Orchestra, and led by Mr. Henri Verbruggen.

The 'Ring' performances were given on Mondays ('Rhinegold'), Tuesdays ('Valkyrie'), Thursdays ('Siegfried'), and Saturday afternoons ('Götterdämmerung'); the intervening dates being filled by performances by the Carl Rosa Opera Company of 'Carmen,' 'Don Giovanni,' 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' 'Marriage of Figaro,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Faust.'

On taking his place to conduct the 'Rhinegold,' Herr Balling was greeted with prolonged applause, and the story of the 'Ring of the Nibelung' began. The opening scene, in which the Rhine-maidens—Mesdames Caroline Hatchard, Lillian Coomber, and Edna Thornton—sing and gambol in the depths of the Rhine, guarding its golden treasure, was very effective, and to those of the audience who were only acquainted with the form of opera in which instrumental music is used chiefly as an accompaniment, the exquisitely beautiful vocal music, wedded to gorgeous descriptive orchestration, was something of a revelation. The cast comprised Messrs. Frederic Austin (Wotan), Charles Knowles (Donner), William Bolland (Froh), E. C. Hedmond (Loki), Thomas Meux (Alberich), Sidney Russell (Mime), Robert Radford (Fasolt), Francis Harford (Fafnir); Mesdames Marie Alexander (Fricka), Florence Easton (Freia), and Edna Thornton (Erda).

In the 'Valkyrie,' the principal characters were represented by Messrs. Francis MacLennan (Sigmund), Robert Radford (Hunding), Frederic Austin (Wotan); Mesdames Florence Easton (Sieglinde), Agnes Nicholls (Brünnhilde), and Marie Alexander (Fricka). The orchestral music in the 'Ride of the Valkyries' and the 'Fire Music' was already familiar to concert-goers, but when heard in association with the action of the drama the effects were greatly enhanced. The close of the last Act, where, to the accompaniment of the weird, throbbing 'Fire Music,' Brünnhilde is laid to sleep under the branches of a spreading tree and surrounded by leaping tongues of flame, was a scene of impressive grandeur.

In 'Siegfried,' Mr. Francis MacLennan, who took the part of the hero, gave a performance which both vocally and dramatically was excellent. The charming 'Waldweben' music was beautifully rendered—the bird part sung by Miss Easton in the first cycle and by Miss Hatchard in the second cycle—and the long but exquisite love duet between Siegfried and Brünnhilde (Madame Agnes Nicholls) was sung and acted delightfully. The Mime of Mr. Sidney Russell was a splendid piece of work, his clear enunciation being a noteworthy feature. The other parts were adequately filled by Messrs. F. Austin (The Wanderer), T. Meux (Alberich), and F. Harford (Fafnir), and Miss Edna Thornton (Erda).

The 'Götterdämmerung' (The Dusk, or Twilight, of the Gods) is in some respects the greatest and the grandest of the four dramas. From the opening scene, where the Norns are discovered on the darkened stage winding the cord of destiny, the action of the drama constantly portrays the inexorableness of fate, and in each succeeding scene the tone of tragic gloom which pervades the work keeps ever deepening till the curtain falls. As Siegfried, Mr. Francis MacLennan fully maintained the reputation he had earned during the week, and Mr. Frederic Austin's Gunther was as satisfactory as his Wotan. Mr. Thomas Meux gave a good account of the part of Alberich, and the Hagen of Mr. Charles Knowles was a powerful impersonation. Miss Florence Easton as 'Gutrune' was very successful, and the Brünnhilde of Madame Agnes Nicholls, especially in the great scene in the last act, was a triumph of vocal and dramatic art. In the first cycle the part of Waltraute was taken by Madame Marie Alexander, and in the second by Madame Edna Thornton, who each sang and acted with distinction. For the chorus of Vassals the Carl Rosa forces were supplemented by members of the Edinburgh Choral Union, Mr. Kirkhope's Choir, and Mr. Moonie's Choir. In the closing scene the spectacular effect of the blazing funeral pyre was extremely realistic, and created a profound impression.

Amongst the factors which contributed to the success of the enterprise, the able and enthusiastic labours of Mr. E. C. Hedmond as stage director call for special recognition, but though all the singers engaged were thoroughly competent and the playing of the orchestra was practically above criticism, the largest measure of praise is undoubtedly due to the masterly control exercised by the conductor, Herr Michael Balling. The musical public of Edinburgh owe a deep debt of gratitude to Herr Denhof for providing on so magnificent a scale this opportunity of witnessing performances of Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelung' in its entirety. It may be said that its production marks an epoch in the musical history of Scotland.

At the close of the performance on March 12, Lord Dunsin, appearing on the stage, presented Herr Balling with a silver laurel wreath, and read a letter of appreciation from the subscribers. He also presented Herr Denhof with a silver rose bowl bearing the following inscription:—'To Herr Ernst Denhof, in commemoration of the artistic success of the first production in the British Islands out of London of Wagner's "Ring," given at the King's Theatre, Edinburgh, February 28 to March 12, 1910.'

THE BACH CHOIR.

This organization, assisted by a contingent of singers from Oxford, gave a performance of Bach's B minor Mass at the Queen's Hall on March 15. The Bach Choir has given many performances of this colossal work, but familiarity does not count for much in lessening its difficulties. The special qualities of the interpretation on this occasion were refinement and general restraint, although from this quality we must except the 'Gloria' and 'Et resurrexit,' in which an effort at vitality resulted in effects not wholly musical. The solos were sung by Madame Gleeson-White, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. McInnes, all of whom are capable Bach singers. But not even their art could conceal the fact that the solo music is inferior in value to the splendid choruses. A feature in the accompaniment of the solos was the skilful 'filling-in' from the figured bass by Sir Walter Parratt on the pianoforte. The band was highly efficient, and the instrumental obbligati were beautifully played by Mr. C. J. Jacobs (violin), Mr. Henri de Busschez and Mr. E. Davies (oboi d'amore), Mr. H. Warner Hollis (flute), and Mr. T. R. Busby (horn). Dr. H. P. Allen conducted with his customary alertness and vigour.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Brahms's 'Triumphlied' and Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' were performed by this Society on March 10 at the Royal Albert Hall, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge. The 'Triumphlied' being largely a reproduction of the style of an earlier period, there was little of the contrast suggested by the names of the composers. However, an impressive performance was given, to the manifest pleasure of a large audience. The choir showed appreciation of the breadth and vigour of both works, and worked with enthusiasm at their by no means light tasks. Mr. Harry Dearth sang the bass solo in Brahms's work; in 'Acis and Galatea' the soloists were Miss Esta D'Argo, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. F. Norcup and Mr. Dearth.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

On March 8 the programme of the Philharmonic Society's concert contained the unusual feature of a composition by Mr. Joseph Holbrooke. This was his tone-poem 'Queen Mab,' which was produced at the Leeds Festival of 1904. It is a highly imaginative work and its orchestration makes it clear that Mr. Holbrooke's vivid methods of scoring are of no recent growth. It was conducted by the composer and received with great favour by the audience. The soloist of the occasion was M. Emile Saurer, who played Beethoven's Violin concerto with individual delicacy. Miss Perceval Allen sang an excerpt from 'Tristan and Isolde' with dramatic force. The remaining numbers were Spontini's Overture to 'La Vestale' and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite 'Christmas Night.' Signor Mancinelli was the conductor.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert given at Queen's Hall on March 7 witnessed the revival of two interesting works, Mackenzie's second 'Scottish Rhapsody' and Dvorák's Symphonic Variations for orchestra. Both deserve more frequent inclusion in concert programmes than has hitherto been granted them. The Rhapsody is a splendid commentary on tunes that are a national possession, and one of the best examples of an art-form that has much to recommend it. The latter description applies with equal force to Dvorák's work, which loses nothing by not being scholastic. The Symphony of the occasion was Brahms's First, which received treatment worthy of the traditions of the Orchestra. The remaining numbers were Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischütz' and a 'Brandenburg' Concerto by Bach.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Her Majesty the Queen was present at the concert given by this Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald on February 24, and listened to a programme that represented three phases of modern music at their best. The conductor infused his usual dash and brilliance into his reading of Strauss's 'Don Juan,' but the players did not respond with absolute precision. Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un faune' was then played with the proper delicacy and languor. The chief attraction, however, was Elgar's Symphony, of which Mr. Ronald's individual interpretation had already been heard with pleasure more than once. On this occasion the composer was an interested listener. The only remaining numbers on the programme consisted of songs contributed by Madame Nina Menzies.

Mr. Landon Ronald and his Orchestra submitted themselves on March 17, at Queen's Hall, to a severe test—in many respects the severest they have undergone—by performing Beethoven's C minor Symphony. The interpretation was a fine one, and it added to Mr. Ronald's numerous laurels. Novelty was imparted to the programme by the overture to Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's opera 'Thelma.' This was rugged, virile music, highly characteristic of the composer in its rhythms, and effectively scored. Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto was played with excellent facility by Miss Augusta Cottlow, and Mr. Edmund Burke sang 'Wotan's Abschied' from 'Die Walküre.' It will be seen that in accordance with the usual plan of these concerts the programme was commendably short.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first of the three extra Symphony Concerts given on March 12 was almost entirely devoted to Beethoven, whose three 'Leonora' overtures and C minor Symphony were heard. Though not without historical interest, the performance of the three overtures in succession undoubtedly produces a certain feeling of monotony. The soloist of the concert, Herr Moriz Rosenthal, played the 'Emperor' concerto technically brilliantly, but with what appeared to be a disregard of the symphonic structure of the music. His supreme virtuosity was however displayed to the greatest advantage in Brahms's enormously difficult Variations on a theme of Paganini. As an encore, Herr Rosenthal played most gracefully his arrangement in thirds of Chopin's Valse in D flat, a most remarkable acrobatic feat. Mr. Henry J. Wood conducted.

MILTON'S 'COMUS.'

Two excellent stage performances of Milton's Masque, 'Comus,' were given at Caxton Hall on March 8 and 9, for the benefit of the Organists' Benevolent League and Our Dumb Friends' League. The most notable feature was the incidental music employed. It consisted of the music composed by Henry Lawes expressly for the Masque, with the addition of appropriate instrumental pieces by his contemporaries, as selected and arranged by Sir Frederick Bridge for the Milton Tercentenary in 1908. The music was admirably performed by a small string band and by efficient solo and choral vocalists. Mr. Henry Bird conducted at the first performance and Sir Frederick Bridge at the second. The chief honours for acting and singing were carried off by Miss Beatrice Spencer as the Lady and Mr. Gordon Cleather as the Attendant Spirit. Miss Spencer gave a portrayal of intensely dramatic nature; Mr. Cleather bore himself with dignity and made the best use of a fine voice. Mr. Frank Stevens impersonated Comus to the life. The parts of the Brothers were taken with ability by Mr. Alex Payne and Mr. Cecil Blount, and that of Sabrina by Miss Ethel Henry Bird, who also performed the duties of Mistress of the Songs. The dances, arranged by Miss Cowper Coles, were well conceived and gracefully executed. Miss Jean C. Archer was Mistress of the Wardrobe, Mr. Gerald Lahee Director of the Stage and Mr. Frank Stevens Master of the Masque. Crowded and appreciative audiences attended both performances. The success of the venture suggests that Masques and similar works offer a field of enterprise, hitherto somewhat neglected, for amateur societies and the givers of occasional entertainments.

'THE DREAM OF GERONTIUS' AT TUNBRIDGE WELLS AND PORTSMOUTH.

The Vocal Association gave its fortieth annual oratorio concert in the Great Hall, Tunbridge Wells, on Thursday, March 10, before a crowded audience. The principal work performed was Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius,' which was preceded by Mendelssohn's 'When Israel out of Egypt came.' The Association gave the first performance of the former work in this part of the country over three years ago, and has produced four works by Sir Edward Elgar during the past four years, also for the first time in the South of England. In this the Society deserves the heartiest commendation for its enterprise, and all concerned are to be congratulated on its most recent success. The choir and orchestra numbered about 200 performers. The solo parts were admirably sung by Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. William Higley. The orchestra, composed chiefly of members of the Queen's Hall and London Symphony Orchestras, under the leadership of Mr. W. A. Easton, deserve praise for their excellent playing of the accompaniments. The choir had been most carefully rehearsed under the able conductor, Mr. W. W. Starmer, who had also imbued them with the enthusiasm and understanding necessary for the proper artistic interpretation of the work. The performance aroused the greatest interest, and some of the audience came a distance of more than thirty miles.

A highly effective performance of Elgar's oratorio was given by the Philharmonic Society in the Town Hall, Portsmouth, on March 10. The choir, under the zealous training and conductorship of Mr. Hugh Burry, entered fully into the devotional spirit of the work, their singing of 'Praise to the Holiest' being extremely fine, while they realized very ably the dramatic effect of the Demons' Chorus. Miss Carmen Hill sang the part of the Angel with great charm, and Mr. Albert Archdeacon gave a sympathetic rendering of the Angel of the Agony, while it need hardly be said that Mr. Gervase Elwes sang the title-part with superlative skill. A complete orchestra, led by Mr. Stanley Blagrove, gave full effect to the beautiful instrumentation.

The British and Foreign Musicians' Society held their eighty-eighth annual meeting recently, when the annual report stated that the Society has had a heavy expenditure on account of sickness, deaths, and old age, thirty-five members having been on the sick fund during the year and received £229. Thirteen old-age pensioners received £274, and £100 was spent in death payments, while six widows and two orphans are in receipt of annual incomes from the Special Fund. The Society was founded in 1822, and it is not generally known that its membership consists entirely of orchestral players. It has long been considered that the title of the Society does not sufficiently explain its objects, and it was resolved that the title should in future be changed to that of 'The Professional Musicians' Sick and Pension Society.'

London Concerts.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Two new works were performed by this choir at Queen's Hall on March 2, under the direction of Mr. Franco Leoni. The one was a setting for baritone, male chorus and orchestra of Gerhardt Hauptmann's 'Im Nachtzug,' with an English text by Mr. F. E. Weatherly, under the title of 'The Night Mail.' The music did not reproduce the philosophical strain of parts of the poem, but the descriptive passages were treated adequately. The other novelty was an Ingoldsby Legend, 'Look at the clock,' set for contralto, tenor, mixed chorus and orchestra by Mr. Hubert Bath. It follows up the vein of Mr. Bath's 'The wedding of Shon McLean,' but is less consistently humorous and therefore less likely to succeed. It contains, however, some clever passages. The programme included Delibes's 'Les frileuses' and Mr. Clutsam's 'The quest of Rapunzel.' The soloists were Madame Ada Crossley, Miss Carmen Hill, Madame Ada Davies, Mr. James Hay and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A number of short pieces and extracts were given by the students of this institution at two dramatic and operatic performances on March 17 and 18. The features of musical interest were a scene from 'Lohengrin' and the operetta 'Trial by Jury.' Miss Margaret Ismay as Elsa, Miss Louie James as Ortrud, and Mr. William J. Samuells as Telramund, sang and acted with excellent effect in the Wagner excerpt, and Miss Olive Turner as the Bride, Mr. Edward E. Butcher as the Defendant, and Mr. Henry Sanders as the Judge, entered into the spirit of Sullivan's work. The five dramatic productions were supervised by Mr. Richard Temple, and Mr. Edgardo Lévi was responsible for the operatic pieces.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Schumann's beautiful but rarely-heard Symphony in C major was played by the students' orchestra, under the direction of Sir Charles Stanford, at a concert given on March 16. The orchestra not only did complete justice to this work, but also gave a thoroughly sympathetic reading of the accompaniment to Beethoven's Violin concerto. The solo violinist was Mr. Thomas Peatfield, a scholar of the College, who showed promising technique and expression. Songs were given by Miss Nora Moon.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

By mounting Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas' for three performances on March 17, 18 and 19, the Guildhall School again earned the thanks of musicians, for the work belongs to the large category of masterpieces of which knowledge is gained only in history-books, supplemented by an occasional 'aria' sung at a concert. In the excellent theatre at the School, scenic and other stage effects were secured on an adequate scale. The chief parts were well taken by Miss Ethel Elmes (Dido), Mr. Eldon Dacre (Æneas) and Mr. Carl True (the Sorcerer), who realized the dramatic qualities of the music. Good work was done by Miss Lilian Green, Miss Dorothy Brede and the chorus. Mr. W. H. Walthew conducted.

At the orchestral concert given under the direction of Dr. W. H. Cummings on March 16, works of Arne dominated the programme. These were the overture and an aria, 'The soldier tired of war's alarms,' from 'Artaxerxes,' 'Guardian angels,' from 'Alfred,' and 'Now Phoebus sinketh in the west,' from the music to 'Comus.' Mr. Arthur Duley played the solo part of Sterndale Bennett's Pianoforte concerto in F, No. 4.

OXFORD HOUSE CHORAL AND ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

The annual visit of the Oxford House Musical and Dramatic Association choir and orchestra to Queen's Hall took place on March 8, and again revealed enterprise and achievement that few West-end musical bodies can match. Under the inspiring direction of Mr. Cuthbert Kelly, they gave a performance of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' that was distinguished by its insight into the spirit and meaning of the work. The good tone and precision of their singing were notable not only in Brahms's work but also in Mendelssohn's 'As the hart pants,' which was impressively interpreted, especially as regards the final chorus. The soprano part was well sung by Madame le Mar, with whom were associated Messrs. Roland Jackson, Frank Giles, Arthur Hider and Robert Leach in the quintet. The orchestra played the 'Meistersinger' overture and four movements from Elgar's second suite 'The wand of youth' with excellent effect. Schubert's 'Who is Sylvia?' was sung by the Excelsior Boys' Club, and encored. The Princess of Wales and Princess Marie Louise of Schleswig-Holstein honoured the concert with their presence.

Mr. Smallwood Metcalfe's choir gave a concert at St. James's Hall on March 9. The choral programme of sixteen numbers was effectively interpreted, but a deeper expression would have done better justice to portions of the music. Mendelssohn's 'Judge me, O God,' Edwards's 'In going to my lonely bed,' Festa's 'Down in a flow'ry vale,' Macfarren's 'You stole my love,' Stanford's 'Heracitus,' Elgar's 'Weary wind of the west,' and Bantock's 'On Himalay' were included. The soprano part of Sullivan's 'The night is calm and cloudless' ('Golden Legend') was sung by Miss Amy Evans.

A concert was given at Cannon Street Hotel on March 10 by the Louthbury Male Voice Choir, under the direction of Mr. T. B. Evison, who has held the office of conductor since the choir was inaugurated thirty-five years ago. The programme, divided into sacred and secular portions, was well chosen and gave abundant scope for the technical and expressive skill of the chorists. Among the most interesting pieces sung were Max Reger's 'Bright through the window,' 'The Exile' by S. E. Lovatt, Hugo Kaun's 'Praise God,' and a very effective motet, 'Justitiae Domini,' written by Mr. A. J. Phillips, who conducted its performance.

The advanced ability of the North London Orchestral Society was displayed at Queen's Hall on March 18, at a concert given under the direction of Mr. Lennox Clayton. The chief feature was an excellent performance of Dvůřák's fourth Symphony in G major. Sir Charles Stanford's first 'Irish Rhapsody' was played with the composer as conductor. Songs were given by Madame Le Mar, and Miss May Mukle played a manuscript Violoncello concerto by Sullivan.

At a concert of the Broadwood series, given at Æolian Hall on March 10, Dr. Walford Davies's Temple Church Choir provided an unusual feature, and one of great interest, by singing Bach's cantata, 'Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit,' and a number of modern part songs. They overcame the difficulties of Elgar's 'Deep in my soul' with success, and gave expressive readings of Stanford's 'Heracitus,' Parry's 'Better music ne'er was known,' 'Sweet day so cool,' and 'In a harbour grene,' and Dr. Davies's 'All is rest.' The tone of the choir was pure and well blended, and as was to be expected in any choral singing prepared by Dr. Davies, interpretative insight and feeling were constantly shown. It was remarkable that so small a choir should be able to undertake, with complete success, work somewhat outside of their ordinary routine.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

At the concert given at Novello's Music Room on March 2 by the London Chamber Concert Association, the programme consisted of works by Mozart, Jeremiah Clarke, J. S. Bach, Domenico Scarlatti, Purcell and J. Christian Bach, in which wind instruments played a large part. The compositions by the lesser-known composers contained passages of extraordinary beauty. Their exquisite and detailed workmanship was reproduced in the manner of performance on this occasion. Thus the feature that had distinguished other concerts of the series was again evident.

On March 8 the Société des concerts français devoted the programme of their concert at Bechstein Hall to composers whose names are not unfamiliar to London concert-goers. The chief share was allotted to the works of Edouard Lalo, who was represented by songs sung by Mlle. E. Noorise and a Violoncello concerto in D, played by M. Fernand Pollain, with Mlle. Antoinette Veluard at the pianoforte. The other composers were Emmanuel Chabrier, Paul Dukas and Henry Février.

A concert of chamber music in aid of the Scholarship Fund of the London Academy of Music was given at the Hampstead Conservatoire on March 10, when a special feature of interest was the production of a Quintet for pianoforte, two violins, viola and violoncello in F (Op. 39), by Hugo Kaun, which, although published some years since, had not previously been performed. It is modern in form without being ultra-modern, and possesses considerable melodic interest. It was admirably played by the Misses Maude Dixon, Gertrude Gregory, Bertha Tressler and Harriett Boatwright, and Mr. Charles Hambourg. Beethoven's Trio in C minor (Op. 1, No. 3) was also played by the Misses Ivy Parkin and Gladys Hayes, and Mr. Charles Hambourg. Between the two concerted pieces Mr. Charles Fry recited with customary effect 'The Bells,' with Stanley Hawley's music, of which Miss Maude Dixon was an able exponent, and as an encore Mr. Fry gave 'The story of a faithful soul,' with the same composer's music. The distribution of medals and certificates to the successful students of the Academy at the Christmas examinations was made on March 3 by Lady Beachcroft.

The first of two concerts arranged by Miss Grace Sunderland and Mr. Frank Thistleton took place at Steinway Hall on March 15. As usual a highly interesting programme was provided, which included Dr. Arne's Sonata in A major for two violins, violoncello, double-bass and pianoforte. Two other English composers, John Dowland and William Corbaine, were represented in the songs sung by Mr. George Bowden. Works by Corelli, Bach (two 'Ausgewählte Arien' for voice with violin obbligato), Handel and Mozart completed the programme. The instruments upon which the chamber music was played included violins by Nicola Gagliano (dated 1740) and Lorenzo Storioli (dated 1753), a violoncello by Giovanni Grancino (dated 1710), and double basses by Giovanni Battista del Pian (dated 1826) and Carlo Giuseppe Testori (1690); the last-mentioned instrument was that of Bottesini. The second concert will take place on April 14.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

On February 22 (the hundredth anniversary of Chopin's birth) M. Leopold Godowsky gave a recital at Queen's Hall. The programme, which consisted entirely of works by Chopin, included the two Sonatas in B flat minor (Op. 35) and in B minor (Op. 58), the Fantaisie in F minor, the F sharp minor Polonaise (Op. 44), and various other pieces. Throughout the recital M. Godowsky showed himself in full possession of his famous technical powers, and from this point of view his renderings of the Scherzo in B minor (Op. 20, 'Le banquet infernal') and the Polonaise (Op. 44) were nothing short of sensational. Where other qualities such as sympathy, charm, intimacy, and warmth of feeling were required, the pianist was less successful, and admirable as his playing was technically, M. Godowsky did not present so clearly the romantic aspect of Chopin's genius.

The name of Chopin also figured largely in the programme of Mr. Richard Buhlig, who on the same evening gave his third recital at the Æolian Hall. Though he gave good interpretations of the Funeral March Sonata and the Barcarolle, he realised the beauties of Beethoven's Sonatas Op. 109 and 57 still more completely, and his playing of the last movement of the Sonata Appassionata was an entirely convincing artistic achievement.

On Monday afternoon, February 28, Miss Johanne Stockmarr gave a recital 'under the immediate patronage of H.M. Queen Alexandra,' at Æolian Hall. The programme included, in addition to Schubert's Fantaisie, Op. 15 and Schumann's immensely difficult Toccata, some interesting pieces by Brahms, Dohnányi (Rhapsody) and Debussy. Miss Stockmarr played throughout with genuine musicianly understanding, and displayed great technical ability in Liszt's Etude 'Feux follets.'

At Æolian Hall, on March 1, Mr. Louis Edger brought forward a programme that included Schumann's 'Carnaval' (Op. 9) and a Chopin group. Bechstein Hall was the scene of Mr. Frederick Lamond's recital on March 2, and of two recitals given by Miss Katherine Goodson on March 2 and 11. Choosing familiar music for the greater part of her programme, Miss Goodson upheld her reputation as one of the foremost of lady pianists. At Æolian Hall, Miss Augusta Cottlow gave a second display of her ability, particularly in Macdowell's G minor Sonata; and on March 4, Mr. Herbert Fryer again gave pleasure with his masterly methods.

The feature of Miss Polyxena Fletcher's playing at Queen's Hall on March 4 was its restraint, a quality which was specially welcome in Bach's fifth 'Brandenburg' Concerto for pianoforte, flute, violin and orchestra. Mr. A. Fransella (flute), Mr. Maurice Sons (violin) and the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Mr. Henry J. Wood, combined with Miss Fletcher to give an excellent performance. Beethoven's G major Concerto and Paderewski's 'Polish Fantasia' also received adequate treatment in the hands of the concert-giver.

Mr. Frederick Moore, who gave a recital at St. James's Hall on March 5, played a programme mainly consisting of well-known works. His pièces de résistance were Bach's Chromatic Phantasy and Fugue (Bulow's edition), of which he gave a fluent and crisp rendering, and Beethoven's 'Moonlight' Sonata. Later in the programme he showed considerable executive powers in the Etudes Op. 10, No. 10, Op. 25, Nos. 3 and 6, by Chopin. A little piece—'Elfenreigen'—by the concert-giver pleased the audience so much that it had to be repeated.

Miss Marguerite Melville-Lisniewska made her first appearance in England, at Bechstein Hall, on March 10, and created a favourable impression with the refinement and sympathy of her style. On March 17, at Bechstein Hall, Miss Helena Lewyn made her first appearance in England with great success. Miss Edith Gunthorpe gave a Schumann programme at Æolian Hall on March 18, aided by Miss Marjorie Hayward (violinist) and Mr. Walton O'Donnell (violinist).

VOCAL RECITALS.

Mrs. George Swinton, who gave at the Bechstein Hall, on March 3, one of the most attractive vocal recitals of the winter season, has made great progress as an artist during the last year or two. She shows mastery over some beautiful resources of tone-colour, and her interpretations of music of various schools are distinguished by insight and are free from any taint of exaggeration. On this occasion Mrs. Swinton sang the whole twelve songs of Schumann's 'Liederkreis' cycle and 'Quatre mélodies' by Albeniz, which served as a capital foil to two charming songs, 'La Chêne' and 'La Sulamite,' by Liapounow. Purcell's 'Evening hymn,' and songs by Landon Ronald, Sir Hubert Parry, Roger Quilter and Hubert Bath were in the programme. Mr. Hamilton Harty accompanied.

Mlle. Elena Gerhardt is usually at her best when accompanied by Herr Arthur Nikisch. Under these circumstances she gave, at Bechstein Hall on March 5, a remarkable display of her unrivalled powers as a Lieder singer. Brahms's 'Zigeunerlieder' were the chief feature of a memorable series of interpretations.

Madame Nina Menzies had the privilege of being accompanied at the pianoforte by Mr. Landon Ronald when she gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on March 7. Her readings of a number of songs of the modern French school were much appreciated.

An interesting programme was selected by Miss Theodora Macalaster for her recital at Steinway Hall on March 9. At Æolian Hall on March 10, Madame Le Mar sang songs by Schubert and Wolf with her wonted sympathy and purity of style.

A native of New Zealand, Miss Mary Cooper, made an excellent impression with her singing at Bechstein Hall on March 14. Her programme covered a wide field, and her interpretations were equally successful in all the different styles. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of pleasant quality.

A number of Irish songs were sung by Mr. Plunket Greene at Æolian Hall on March 17, with Sir Charles Stanford and Mr. Hamilton Harty as accompanists. The programme ranged from traditional airs to modern art-songs, and contained many that Mr. Greene's interpretations have made familiar.

OTHER RECITALS.

On March 2, Miss May Fussell gave a highly interesting violoncello recital at Æolian Hall. She played a distinguished part in the performance of Brahms's Trio (Op. 114) for pianoforte, clarinet and violoncello, and in a Sonata by Hurlstone for violoncello and pianoforte. The clarinetist was Mr. Charles Draper, and the pianist Miss Ada Thomas. Miss Hilda Foster sang.

A remarkable and gratifying success was achieved by Miss May Harrison at the two violin recitals which she gave at Queen's Hall on March 1 and 10. After an interval spent in study abroad, she returned with skill and power of expression so highly developed that she belongs now to the front rank of violinists. At her first concert she played Brahms's Concerto and at the second Max Bruch's 'Scottish Fantasia,' both with perfect mastery. The Queen's Hall Orchestra assisted, under Mr. Henry J. Wood's direction.

The programmes of the recitals given at Æolian Hall, on March 8 and 14, by Mr. Darbishire Jones (violinello) and Mr. Louis Edger (pianoforte) were of interest to the student, as they consisted of all the sonatas written by Beethoven and Brahms for these two instruments in combination. They carried out their formidable task with considerable success, and with promise that their joint efforts will in future be capable of excellent artistic results.

Miss Grace Thynne (violinist) introduced a new 'Suite de cinq morceaux en style ancien' at her concert on March 16 at Bechstein Hall, and proved herself a highly accomplished player. At this Hall, on the same day, the Misses Connie and Lucie van Hulst, performers on the violin and violoncello respectively, gave a successful recital. A violin recital, with Brahms's Sonata in G major (Op. 78) as the chief feature, was given at Steinway Hall on March 19 by Mr. Rudolf Bauerkeller.

Suburban Concerts.

The West Ham Choral Society gave a successful concert in the Town Hall, Stratford, on February 19, when Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was the principal feature in a programme which included Tchaikovsky's '1812' Overture, Elgar's 'Sea Pictures' and 'Pomp and Circumstance' March, No. 1. There was a full band and chorus led by Mr. G. H. Wilby, with Mr. F. Stanley Winter at the organ. The solo vocalists were Miss Mabel Manson, Madame Grace Day-Winter, Mr. Henry Turnpenney and Mr. Charles Knowles. Mr. G. Day-Winter conducted.

On February 26 the Alexandra Palace Choral Society crowned their achievements with a magnificent performance of Bach's B minor Mass. Their acquaintance with the work was intimate, and by virtue of their fine technique it took effect in masterly execution. The broadest climaxes were always distinguished by good tone-quality. Mr. Allen Gill and his forces had clearly approached their task with great enthusiasm, and they received just reward in the presence and evident appreciation of a large audience. The soloists were Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Edith Clegg, Mr. Lloyd Chandos and Mr. Reginald Goud. Mr. G. D. Cunningham was the organist.

The Fulham and District Choral Society gave a concert at the Fulham Town Hall on March 3, when Haydn's 'Creation' was performed. The solos were taken by Miss Kate Cherry, Mr. Charles Saunders and Mr. Herbert Tracey. The general improvement in the choir and orchestra gave evidence of the careful training received from the conductor, Mr. George Wilby.

A concert was given on March 5 at the Wesleyan Lecture Hall, High Street, Stoke Newington, by the Wesleyan Church Choir, augmented, when Bridge's 'Flag of England' was the principal feature of the programme. In this work the choir displayed good attack and expression, under the conductorship of Mr. R. H. Vennall Baker. The solo part was well sung by Miss Mabel Langford. Before the performance of the cantata, the words of the poem were recited by Miss G. Winch.

The Dulwich Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' trilogy at the Crystal Palace on March 5. The singing of the choir, under the direction of the new conductor, Mr. James Brown, was on the whole exceedingly good, and the solo parts were ably sung by Madame Mary Conly, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Bertram Mills.

A successful performance of Haydn's 'Creation' was given by the Harringay Glee and Choral Society and Orchestra, on March 12, in the Northern Polytechnic, Holloway Road. The soloists were Miss Jessie Wood, Mr. William Sheen and Mr. Percival Driver. The choir and orchestra, numbering over 120 performers, showed very careful training on the part of their conductor, Mr. Harry E. King, and the whole work was conspicuous for the variety of expression and good attack. Miss Annie Camm presided at the pianoforte.

The Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society gave a concert, on March 14, at the Chiswick Town Hall, when the chief features of the programme were Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and the 'Death of Minnehaha.' The singing of the choir was marked by good tone, clear enunciation and dramatic power. The orchestra, led by Mr. H. S. MacDermott, played remarkably well, and the performance reflected credit on the able conductor, Mr. David M. Davis. The solo vocalists were Miss Florence Holderness, Mr. Herbert Groves and Mr. Robin Overleigh.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, March 15, 1910.

After a somewhat protracted interval, Herr Siegfried Wagner has again appeared here to conduct a concert given for the benefit of the Deutsche Hilfsverein. The public is always pleased to pay homage to this artist, whose personality is getting more sympathetic, and his outward appearance, with the passing of time, more like that of his great father. In Siegfried Wagner's music, however, the family likeness is but slight. As one could see from the fragments of his operas which were performed, he goes his own way. With regard to orchestral works by Richard Wagner, which his son conducted, the adoption of some unusually slow tempi in the 'Faust' overture and the Prelude to the 'Meistersinger' produced a rather strange effect. Max Reger's 100th Psalm, for chorus, orchestra and organ, was the novelty of the third Gesellschaftsconcert. While the first half of this work, which is laid out on a large scale, made a good impression, the third part is so thickly scored and difficult to grasp that the reception accorded to the work as a whole was very mixed, in spite of the faultless performance given under the conductorship of Herr Schalk. The Philharmonic Orchestra has finished this season's cycle of symphony concerts, and has in addition given a charity concert devoted to works by Brahms, amongst them being the second Pianoforte concerto (excellently played by Mr. Frederic Lamond). A Philharmonic festival matinee, which among other celebrations was to have taken place on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the Philharmonic concerts, had to be postponed till April owing to the fact that the city was in mourning for the Viennese Burgomaster, Dr. Karl Lueger. At the Imperial Opera, Donizetti's 'Liebestrank' ('L'elisir d'amore') has been revived with success. The public was pleased to have an opportunity of once again enjoying real singing and fresh melodic invention. The operas 'Stradella' and 'Mignon' have been given at the Volksoper with a new cast and a tasteful stage-setting.

RICHARD VON PERGER.

Het Residentie Orkest, the celebrated orchestra of The Hague, which was founded by the Professors of the Royal Conservatoire of Music at The Hague, will pay a first visit to London on the afternoon of April 6, at Queen's Hall. The orchestra, which will be conducted on this occasion by Dr. Henri Viotta, especially distinguished itself recently by its remarkable playing at the performances of 'Elektra' at The Hague.

A performance of Franco Leoni's cantata 'The gate of life,' was given by the choir of the Welsh Tabernacle, King's Cross, on February 24. The choir was well balanced and sang throughout with good expression and effect, reflecting credit on the conductor, Mr. David Richards, and there was a small professional orchestra. The solo vocalists were Miss Carrie Lanceley, Mr. John Roberts and Mr. Ivor Foster.

Music in the Provinces.

BELFAST.

What is said to have been the first concert performance in Ireland of Saint-Saëns's opera 'Samson and Delilah,' was given on March 18 by the Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Dr. F. Koeller. The solo artists were Miss Bessie Weir (who at the last moment was kindly lent by Mr. Charles Manners to take the place of Madame Marie Brema, unfortunately absent by illness), Mr. John Harrison and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Miss Weir's part was sung so as to earn her the most enthusiastic applause, and the 'High-priest of Dagon' could not have found a more perfect exponent than in Mr. Bates.

There is scarcely enough choral work to give such ardent amateurs as the Society possess enough to sing, but what they had to do—full as it is of difficulties—was really well done. The orchestra, too, showed how careful Dr. Koeller's training had been: for an orchestra largely amateur, it is no slight feat to have performed as well as they did.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society secured an enormous success with their magnificent performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' cycle, given in the Town Hall on February 24 under Dr. Sinclair's ever-watchful conductorship. Indeed, the popularity of the work shows no diminution; on the contrary, although the cycle had only been given a few days previously by the Midland Musical Society before a crowded assembly, hundreds were not able to gain admission on the latter occasion. It is to be doubted if a more poignant and graphic reading has ever been heard in Birmingham, at least so far as the choral portion of the work is concerned, and no loophole was left for criticism. The principals were Miss Está D'Arco, Mr. Charles Saunders and Mr. Herbert Brown, who evidently inspired by the choristers seemed to put all their vitality and temperament into their task.

Coleridge-Taylor was strongly in evidence that week, for two days afterwards, on Saturday, February 26, the composer of 'Hiawatha' appeared at the Town Hall in person to conduct a concert given by the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra. He met with a most enthusiastic reception, and seemed to have accomplished wonders even with one rehearsal only, completely gaining the sympathy of the rank and file. The first part included several of his orchestral works—the Overture 'Hiawatha,' not heard here previously, the Intermezzo from the incidental music to Goethe's 'Faust,' as produced by Sir Herbert Tree, and the Suite 'Nero,' the latter already well-known to local audiences. The 'Nero' suite created the utmost enthusiasm, and the composer at the close was the recipient of quite an ovation. The Birmingham Madrigal Choir, conducted by Mr. Edwin Stephenson, the organist and master of the choir of the Birmingham Cathedral, supplied the vocal portion of the programme, their selections comprising a number of madrigals and part-songs by 16th century writers, and by Granville Bantock, Sweeting, Rogers and Pearsall. The singing throughout was artistic and refined, and characterized by admirable gradation of light and shade.

The last Harrison concert of the current series was given in the Town Hall on February 21, and was entirely orchestral, the executive being the London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Nikisch, who gave a somewhat sensational reading of Beethoven's fifth Symphony in C minor. Marvellous as was the performance, one missed the classic solidity of a Richter in the interpretation. But really great was the sterling and moving rendering of Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations and Wagner's new 'Venusberg' music, for nothing could have surpassed them in richness of tone and phrasing. An interesting concert was given by Miss Dorothy Silk, a native of this city, a soprano gifted with an exceedingly pure voice, admirably trained in this country and lately under an eminent professor of singing at Vienna.

O TENDER SLEEP.

April 1, 1910.

The image displays a musical score for the song "O Tender Sleep" (Op. 142, No. 1) by Franz Schubert. The score is written for voice and piano. The key signature is D major (two sharps: F# and C#), and the time signature is 3/4. The vocal line is written on a single staff, and the piano accompaniment is written on a grand staff (treble and bass staves). The lyrics are in English and are written below the vocal line. The score includes dynamic markings such as pp (pianissimo) and p (piano), and phrasing slurs. The piano part features a simple, rhythmic accompaniment with chords and single notes. The overall mood is gentle and tender, reflecting the title of the song.

The concert was given at the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on March 8, before a crowded audience. Gifted with an excellent memory, aided by linguistic ability, Miss Silk was enabled to do complete justice to the number of songs she gave in German, French and English. Mr. Max Mossel, the well-known violinist, contributed some excellently performed violin solos, and Mr. G. H. Manton accompanied. The last Max Mossel drawing-room concert of the season took place in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on March 10, and proved a fitting finale to an admirable series of concerts. M. Arthur de Greef, the eminent Belgian pianist, Miss Grainger-Kerr, vocalist, and Mr. Max Mossel, the artists, and Mr. G. H. Manton the accompanist. A feature of the concert was the fine performance of César Franck's Sonata for pianoforte and violin in A major, by M. de Greef and Mr. Mossel. The last chamber concert of the season, organized by the Clifton Quintet, took place at Queen's College on March 15.

The New Choral Society gave their fifth concert of unaccompanied part-songs, choruses, folk-songs and madrigals in the Town Hall, on March 10, under Mr. Rutland Boughton's direction. The programme on this occasion contained excerpts of considerable polyphonic tendency, demanding in their interpretation uncommon vocal technique, and it is only just to state that Mr. Rutland Boughton had evidently taken great pains in the training of the choir, the result in most instances being highly meritorious. Max Reger's five-part chorus 'Palm Sunday,' for instance, is no child's play. Excellently given was Elgar's six-part chorus 'Go, song of mine,' and of equal merit was the rendering of Stanford's part-songs 'Valentine's song' and 'The fairies.' Miss Norah Newport realised an artistic success in a number of songs by Elgar and Bantock, and in three Somerset folk-songs.

The Birmingham Choral Union's concert recital of Wallace's opera 'Maritana' drew an overflowing audience to the Town Hall on March 12. Mr. Thomas Facer conducted a really fine performance. The solo vocalists were Miss Elizabeth Burgess, Miss Olive Park, Mr. John Child, Mr. Dillon Shallard and Mr. Tom Howell.

The Sutton Coldfield Choral Society gave their twentieth concert in the Sutton Coldfield Town Hall, on March 10, under Mr. Joseph H. Adams's conductorship. The programme was practically the same as that given in the Birmingham Town Hall on February 5, including Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Elgar's choral suite 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' and Schubert's 'Song of Miriam.' The full choir and orchestra of the Society were present, and so admirably performed was Elgar's work that it had to be repeated. Miss Euneta Truscott and Mr. E. Everard Healey, the solo vocalists, were both heard to great advantage. The miscellaneous selection comprised some orchestral pieces capably rendered.

The Erdington Choral Concert Society made a somewhat daring experiment by giving at the Public Hall, Erdington, on March 2, a performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' without orchestra, the accompaniments being played on the pianoforte by Mr. F. V. Madeley. Considering the difficulty of the work, and the little support a pianoforte can give, the rendering was creditable enough, the chorus, although unequally balanced, realising commendable gradation of light and shade and firm attack. Quite excellent were the principals, Miss Lillie Aston, Mr. Walter J. Ottey, and Mr. A. S. Leigh. Mr. Harold G. Godfrey conducted, and Mr. J. Wood played Beethoven's Sonata 'Pathétique.'

The Darlaston Choral Society gave at their concert, on March 14, an efficient rendering of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Wedding-feast,' from the 'Hiawatha' cycle, with band and chorus. The programme also included the 'Peer Gynt' suite, Max Bruch's Violin concerto in B flat (Mr. T. E. Clarke) and Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, the solo pianoforte part by Mr. A. N. Johnson. Miss Nellie Finch and Mr. Frank Mullings were the solo vocalists, and Mr. Thomas Johnson conducted.

The financial report of the Newcastle-on-Tyne festival shows a profit of over £317, and no call will therefore be made on the guarantors. The sum of one hundred guineas has been handed to the Royal Victoria Infirmary, and the balance has been carried forward as a reserve fund for the next festival.

BRISTOL.

The Bristol Choral Society gave a performance of Haydn's 'Creation,' at Colston Hall, on February 26. The choir and orchestra numbered upwards of 500, there being upon this occasion, in addition to the ordinary orchestra at the concerts of the Society, the Society of Instrumentalists, with Mr. Harold Bernard, leader. Mr. G. Herbert Riseley was at the organ. The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Dan Price. Under the capable direction of Mr. George Riseley, an admirable performance of the oratorio was afforded.

On March 7 there was an interesting chamber concert at the Victoria Rooms. The Mossel String Quartet (Messrs. Max Mossel, A. Moore, D. Reggel, and Johan C. Hock) interpreted with skill Haydn's Quartet in D major and César Franck's Quartet in the same key. Mr. Max Mossel's violin solo, 'La Folia' (Corelli) was much appreciated, and Mr. and Mrs. Johan C. Hock rendered acceptably Grieg's Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte in A minor (Op. 36).

A successful concert was given on March 7 in the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, St. James's Square, on behalf of the Bedminster Association. Mr. George Riseley arranged the performance, and under his able direction fifty members of the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society gave some of their most popular pieces. There were also songs by Miss K. Gerrish, Miss G. Winchester, Messrs. F. H. Wensley, A. Spear, G. A. Noble, and R. Frost; violin solos by Mr. Harold Bernard, and pianoforte solos by Mr. G. Herbert Riseley.

The Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave their last concert of the season at the Victoria Rooms on March 9, Mr. F. S. Gardner holding the principal first violin, and Mr. Hubert Hunt conducting. The chief work presented was Tchaikovsky's Symphony in E minor, No. 5, a fine rendering being afforded. This was succeeded by a novelty, a Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in B flat major, by Frank Merrick, a Bristolian who has attained a good position as a pianist and has produced a few minor compositions. His present example contains some admirable features, and with Mr. Merrick at the solo instrument, well supported by the orchestra, these were made apparent and enthusiastically recognised by the hearers. Other instrumental numbers were the overture 'Le Baruffe Chiozzette' (Sinigaglia), and Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch.' Miss Laura Evan-Williams was the vocalist.

The Clifton Quintet concluded their eighth season at the Victoria Rooms, on March 9. The performers were Messrs. Herbert Parsons (pianoforte), Maurice Alexander and Ernest Lane (violins), Alfred Best (viola), and Percy Lewis (violoncello). There were satisfactory performances of Christian Sinding's Quintet in E minor and Beethoven's Quartet in G major, No. 2 (Op. 18). Mr. Parsons contributed four solos, and was associated with Mr. Lewis in Böellmann's Sonata in A minor (Op. 40).

On March 16 the Bristol Dolphin Male Choir gave a concert in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Simpson. Several part-songs were creditably rendered, and other features were vocal solos by Miss Amy Richards, Miss G. Winchester, Messrs. A. E. Monks, F. C. Frost, and A. Eastman. Miss Bertha Simpson played pianoforte pieces, and Mr. Reginald Forward was the accompanist.

DEVON.

Almost without musical events of any description Plymouth is observing the Lenten fast, the happenings being chiefly of sacred music. The Edgcombe Street Society (Stonehouse) gave their annual concert on February 23, singing glees and part-songs by Barnby, Pinsuti, Schumann and Pearsall, conducted by Mr. Cecil Palmer. The Zion Male-Voice Choir on March 7 sang pieces by German, Pinsuti, &c., conducted by Rev. S. R. Jenkins. The Pennyross Choir made their first appearance on March 9 outside the church, and with augmented forces gave 'Christ and His soldiers' very creditably, under the direction of Mr. F. E. Notcutt. At St. Saviour's Church, on March 16, Mr. W. G. Nelder conducted a performance of Stainer's 'The Crucifixion,' and on March 17 Maunders 'Olivet to Calvary' was conducted at Palace Street by Mr. Bernard Crocker. Mutley Wesleyan Choir (Mr. J. Wibberley) sang 'The Crucifixion' on March 20, and the same cantata was sung at St. Saviour's and St. James-the-Less (Mr. R. Ball) on Good Friday. Among other performances given on that day were Haydn's 'Passion' music and 'St. John the Baptist' (Mr. A. T. Townsend); Bennett's 'The Woman of Samaria,' at Mutley Baptist Church (Mr. Harold Lake); Maunder's 'Olivet to Calvary,' at St. George's (Mr. Alban W. Cooper).

In instrumental work the only event to be noticed is Mr. Frank Winterbottom's fourth Symphony Concert at Stonehouse, the Symphony being Brahms's No. 2. Other pieces were the Mozart Serenade for strings, Bennett's overture 'The Naiades,' and 'Slavonic dances' by Dvorák.

Mr. Manley Martin has transferred (temporarily) his Mutley and Mannamed Choral Society from the northern suburb to St. Catherine's Church, where the 'Hymn of Praise' will be given with the church choir shortly after Easter.

Miss Winifred Carter and Mr. Manley Martin gave a concert at Tavistock on March 7, the former contributing vocal pieces and the latter organ solos. One of the best performances yet given by the Paignton Choral Society was that of 'The Creation,' on March 9, when Mr. Wilfrid Layton obtained some very fine singing from a well-balanced choir. The principals were Miss Kate Cherry, Messrs. Will Foster and Alfred J. Layton. A choir of fifty voices sang 'The Messiah' at the little country town of Ottery St. Mary, on March 11, their performance being characterized by vitality of tone and spontaneity of expression, reflecting much credit on their conductor, Mr. W. Lathrope. An interesting occasion at Torquay, on March 12, was the chamber concert, given by Miss Beatrice Heaviside and Mr. C. F. Heaviside. The lady sang with artistic instinct Lieder by Bleichmann, and songs by Woelforde-Finden, Max Slange and Chaminade. Mr. Heaviside played Beethoven's Sonata Op. 28, and pieces by Schumann, Mendelssohn and Chopin. The Gade Trio, Op. 47, was performed by Mrs. Handford (pianoforte), Miss Heaviside (violin), and Mr. Heaviside (violoncello).

It is encouraging to report that at the annual meeting of the Exeter Oratorio Society, held on March 16, under the presidency of Mr. H. Imbert-Terry, it was reported that Dr. H. J. Edwards, the valued conductor, who had been absent for several months, had returned to his duties completely restored to health. The statement of accounts showed a good balance in hand; a festival was reported impending in April in conjunction with the Western Counties Choral Association, and the Society had already put in rehearsal the Scottish rhapsodie 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean,' the composer of which, Mr. Hubert Bath, is a native of Devonshire.

DUBLIN.

The College Choral Society gave a concert on February 25, conducted by Mr. Charles G. Marchant. The programme was as follows: Nicolai's 'Fest-overture'; Palmieri's Psalm cxvii., an effective work for soprano solo and chorus, performed for the first time on this occasion; Mendelssohn's Morning and Evening Services, orchestrated by Mr. Charles Marchant; and Spohr's 'God, Thou art great.' Madame Borel was the soprano soloist, and the orchestra (mostly composed of amateur members of the Society) was led by Mr. Arthur Darley.

At the Royal Dublin Society the chamber music recitals were brought to a close on February 28 with an organ recital by Dr. Sinclair, of Hereford. On February 21, Dr. M. Esposito gave a Chopin recital in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's birth, which attracted the largest audience at this season's recitals. Dr. Esposito, whose fine qualities as a musician and pianist were fully displayed on this occasion, played a representative selection from the composer's works, including the B flat minor Sonata, the F minor Ballade, and a group of the Studies.

On March 3 the Dublin Orchestral Society (conductor, Dr. M. Esposito) gave the second concert of the season. Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony, Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, Sammartini's 'Pastorale' (arranged by Martucci), Saint-Saëns's 'Le rouet d'Omphale,' Grieg's 'Spring' (for strings alone), and Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' (first performance in Ireland) made up a very attractive programme.

On March 10, Miss Nora Thomson's quartet gave a chamber music recital. Miss Thomson was supported by Miss Madeleine Moore, M. O. Grisard and Mr. Clyde Twelvetees. Miss Madeleine Macken was the vocalist, and Miss Pauline Elsnor the accompanist. The programme included Haydn's 'Sunrise' quartet and Schumann's quartet in A major.

On the same evening, the Dublin Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Charles G. Marchant, gave a performance of 'The Messiah.' The solo vocalists were Madame Borel, Miss Alicia Keogh, Mr. George White, and Mr. Wesley Guard, all residents in Dublin. Mr. Arthur Darley was leader of the orchestra.

Signor Bozzelli produced a new work from his pen, 'The Lord of Carrigounnel,' on February 24. The work, which is written for soli, chorus and orchestra, was well received. Among the soloists were Miss Christine Gillespie and Mr. W. A. Sheehan.

Sterndale Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria' was performed, on March 14, in Rathmines Parish Church (under the direction of the organist, Mr. Raymond Revelle) by the church choir, augmented for the occasion.

On March 15, Mr. Percy Whitehead gave an interesting song recital at the Aberdeen Hall, assisted by Madame Borel, soprano, Miss Bertha Dowse, violinist, and Mr. C. W. Wilson, accompanist. Mr. Percy Whitehead, who is the possessor of an unusually attractive baritone voice, sang songs by Schubert, Schumann, Cornelius, Stanford, Parry, Hart, and Hardebeck, as well as some traditional airs arranged by Korbay, Charles Wood, Stanford and Vaughan Williams.

EDINBURGH.

Under the auspices of the local centre of the National Song Society, Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser—a daughter of the late Mr. David Kennedy, the celebrated Scottish vocalist—gave an interesting song-lecture and recital of Scottish songs, Highland and Lowland, in the Goud Hall on February 19. The historical remarks on the characteristics of our national melodies were evidently much appreciated by the large audience, and vocal illustrations were charmingly rendered by the lecturer and her sister, Miss Margaret Kennedy.

Two concerts in aid of the Royal Infirmary were given in the Empire Theatre, on February 20 and 27, by the Edinburgh Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Edinburgh Select Choir (conductor, Mr. George Short) and Miss Alice Prowse and Mr. Morgan Kingston, vocalists. The orchestral numbers included the 'William Tell,' 'Oberon' and 'Zampa' overtures and a selection from the 'Meistersinger,' the performance of which reflected much credit on the conductor, Mr. G. W. Crawford.

The programme for the fourth and last of Professor Niecks's Historical Concerts, given in the University Music Class-room on February 23, consisted of three String quartets—in D major, F major and C sharp minor—by Beethoven, illustrating the master's three styles. The performers were Messrs. Henri Verbruggen, Guy Magarh, D. E. Nichols and Jas. Messeas.

The Central Musical Association (conductor, Mr. James Caie) gave a very creditable performance of the 'Messiah' in the Central Hall on February 25. The soloists were Miss Chrissie Macdiarmid, Miss Nina Horsburgh, Mr. W. Howorth and Philip Malcolm. Mr. T. B. Caie accompanied on the organ.

The annual concert of the Southern Choral Association, conductor Mr. E. W. Winning, took place in the Livingstone Hall on March 11. The works performed were Gade's 'Spring's Message' and Handel's 'Acis and Galatea,' and the choruses in these were admirably sung. The solo vocalists were Miss Chrissie Macdiarmid, and Messrs. W. H. Oldham, Robert Marshall and George Campbell.

The Choral Union, conductor Mr. T. H. Collinson, gave a fine performance of Berlioz's 'Faust,' in the Music Hall, on March 14. The choir sang excellently, and with a commendable degree of attention to light and shade. A capable orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Cole, supplied the accompaniments, and gave effective renderings of the purely orchestral numbers with which the work is interspersed. The soloists were Miss Edith Evans, Messrs. John Harrison, Charles Knowles and Philip Malcolm.

Herr Denhof's operatic festival is fully recorded on p. 239.

GLASGOW.

The University Choral Society, conducted by Mr. A. M. Henderson, the organist to the University, gave a successful concert on March 2. In addition to several smaller choral numbers, the programme included Dunhill's 'Tubal Cain' and a first performance here of Somervell's 'Earl Haldan's Daughter,' a very effective piece of choral writing, to which Mr. Henderson's forces did full justice. Vocal solos were given by Miss Rana Taggart and Mr. J. F. S. Adams, and Mr. Henderson contributed three pianoforte solos. Mr. W. F. Forsyth acted as accompanist. For those whose taste lies in the direction of unaccompanied choral music, the concert of the Orpheus Choir (Mr. Hugh S. Robertson, conductor) on March 8 offered a veritable feast. This remarkable body of singers performed, entirely from memory, a programme of no fewer than eighteen pieces, some of which were most exacting, with a delicacy and finish, beauty of tone, and clear enunciation worthy of the highest praise. Miss Emily Breare and Mr. George Henschel were the solo vocalists, and Mr. W. E. Senior the accompanist.

On March 10, the members of Greenock Choral Union gave their second concert for the season, the programme comprising Bach's 'Ein feste Burg' and Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' in both of which the Union was heard to advantage. Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducted the performance, and Mr. Herbert Walton played the accompaniments on the organ.

A largely attended orchestral concert was given on March 13 by the local branch of the Amalgamated Musicians' Union. The orchestra, numbering eighty performers, gave on the whole a good performance of Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' suite, the overtures to 'Oberon' and 'William Tell,' and Mendelssohn's second Pianoforte concerto in D minor, the solo part in the last-named being brilliantly played by Mr. Philip E. Halstead. Miss Jenny Young contributed some vocal solos, and Mr. Henri Verbruggen conducted.

Under the auspices of the Pollokshields Philharmonic Society, three chamber concerts were given on March 9, 16 and 21, and the programmes were devoted exclusively to Beethoven's ten Sonatas for pianoforte and violin. These charming works were artistically interpreted by Messrs. Philip E. Halstead (pianoforte) and Henri Verbruggen (violin). Assisted by the Glasgow Grand Opera Society, Mr. Hutton Malcolm's male-voice choir gave a highly interesting concert on March 15. A feature of the programme was the number of unfamiliar pieces by Pacius, Engelsberg, Sodermann and Schiebold, and these were performed with excellent effect. Of the better-known items, Stanford's 'Songs of the sea' received a vigorous rendering. The combined choirs sang familiar opera-choruses by Wagner. Mr. Philip Malcolm was solo vocalist, and Mr. W. J. Sasbach's violoncello solos lent variety to the programme. Mr. Hutton Malcolm, the conductor, dispensed with the baton, and directed the entire programme at the pianoforte.

The Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society's concert on March 17 showed that the band still maintains that high standard of performance to which Mr. W. T. Hoeck, the able conductor, has accustomed us. The chief features of the programme were Cherubini's Overture to 'Anacreon,' Liszt's first Pianoforte concerto in E flat, Bantock's 'Old English suite,' and the Masque music to 'The Merchant of Venice' (Sullivan). The solo part in the concerto was cleverly played by Miss Gordon Mackenzie, and Mr. Thomas Wallace, the possessor of an excellent tenor voice, gave some songs.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The first performance of Richard Strauss's symphonic poem 'Also sprach Zarathustra' by the Philharmonic Society at their concert on February 22 possessed special interest and significance, and in the performance of this extraordinary music, Dr. Cowen and the orchestra spared no pains. Notable in another way was the anthem 'Sing we merrily,' by Mr. Edward Watson, organist of West Derby Parish Church, who had orchestrated for this occasion the clever work which he wrote for the recent festival of the Church Choir Association. Sir C. V. Stanford's selection of the anthem was again justified by the success of this later performance with orchestra, and the composer received a hearty call. The dramatic and descriptive element in the music is especially effective. The vocalist of the evening, Madame Dónalda, employed her fine voice and cultured art with conspicuous success, notably in Mimi's song from Puccini's 'La Bohème.'

The Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Hans Richter, attracted a great audience on February 26. In the selection of the programme a study in contrasts was designedly offered in Richard Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' followed by Schubert's great Symphony in C, both of which were magnificently played. Interesting also was Gluck's Overture 'Iphigenia in Aulis,' with Wagner's ending, and Liszt's Fantasia on Schubert's 'Wanderer,' for pianoforte and orchestra, very cleverly played by Miss Evelyn Stuart.

The eighth and closing concert of Mr. Vasco Akeroyd's Symphony Orchestra concerts was given on March 1, when a plébiscite programme was submitted which contained, as the result of the voting cards sent in, Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony in B minor, Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' suite and the 'Tannhäuser' overture. Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor (No. 3) was brilliantly played, as regards the solo instrument, by Miss Lena Kontorovitch, a young violinist of evident musical gifts, and Miss Phyllis Lett was the vocalist. It is satisfactory to note that the concerts are to be resumed in the autumn.

On March 2 the Liverpool College of Music held a pupils' concert in the Yamen Rooms, at which the College orchestra, conducted by Mr. Alfred Ross, and Mr. H. E. Hunt's choral society were agreeably heard, and a young violinist of promise, Mr. F. Holliday, played the first movement of Mendelssohn's Violin concerto. Other pieces contributed by pupils of the College testified to the value of specialized training.

The Liverpool Cymric Vocal Union, an old-established choir of between thirty and forty male voices, conducted by Mr. J. T. Jones, gave a delightful exhibition of blending and expressive unaccompanied singing at their annual concert in Hope Hall on March 5. Notable numbers were Bantock's 'Give a rouse,' Geibel's 'A stream of silver sunshine,' Barnby's 'Sweet and low,' and Dr. Parry's 'Monks' war song.' Songs by Madame Laura Evans-Williams and Mr. David Hughes, recitations by Miss Marie Raynor, and violin solos by Mr. John Lawson completed a highly successful programme.

Miss Fanny Davies made a welcome appearance at the eleventh Philharmonic Concert, on March 8, when this distinguished pupil of Madame Clara Schumann played delightfully in Schumann's A minor Pianoforte concerto and in selections from the 'Carnaval.' Brahms's Symphony in F, No. 3, and Charpentier's Serenade from 'Impressions d'Italie,' an interesting movement in which the viola obbligato was skilfully played by Mr. S. Speelman, were the principal orchestral items. Miss Ada Crossley sang a song from Max Bruch's 'Odysseus' and was heard still more acceptably in 'Hark the ecch'ing air' from Purcell's 'Fairy Queen.'

At a meeting of the Welsh National Society in the Royal Institution on March 11, Mrs. Mary Davies, who was formerly so eminent as an oratorio singer, appeared in the rôle of lecturer, her subject being 'The Folk-songs of Wales.' Exhibiting literary merit with fluent diction, the lecturer revealed a wide knowledge of an interesting study. In illustrating folk-song as the source and epitome of the principles upon which musical art is founded, Mrs. Mary Davies had the vocal assistance of Miss Jennie Williams.

A performance of Haydn's 'Creation,' parts 1 and 2, was given on March 12 by the Liverpool and District Methodist Choral Union, conducted by Mr. P. Ingram, the vocal principals being Miss Olive Clare, Mr. Henry Brearley and Mr. R. Radford, the small orchestra being led by Mr. John Lawson, with Mr. Collier at the organ. The performance by this powerful organization, which is doing useful work, was heard with evident appreciation by a large audience. A feature of the miscellaneous second part was Bishop's glee 'Now tramp.'

The second concert of the Oxtou and Cloughton Orchestral Society passed off with encouraging success on March 5, when this newly-established Society, which numbers in its large array of players a goodly proportion of ladies (and is led by Miss D. Berrington), was heard with considerable effect in German's Overture 'Richard III.,' selections from Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite and 'Elegie' for strings, and in Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra (solo by Mr. Walter Hatton). The vocalist was Miss Carlota Jackson-Muñoz, and Mr. J. E. Matthews conducted.

Stanford's ballad for chorus and orchestra, 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' and a concert-selection from German's fairy opera 'The Princess of Kensington,' engaged the attention of the Ormskirck Musical Association on March 8, when this excellently-managed musical force of some 140 singers and players was conducted by Mr. John Ball, with Miss Lillie Wormald and Mr. George Barnett as principal vocalists.

The third subscription concert of the Warrington Musical Society was held in the Parr Hall on March 16, when the programme included a concert-selection from German's opera, 'The Princess of Kensington,' Dr. James Lyon's ballad for chorus and orchestra, 'The Warden of the Cinque Ports,' and Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto, in which the solo was finely played by Mrs. A. H. Crossfield. Dr. Lyon conducted the performance of his attractive work, and received a flattering recall. The principal vocalists were Miss Esta D'Argo and Mr. Webster Millar. A line of appreciation is due to the alert and expressive singing of the fine choir of 220 voices. Mr. Frank H. Crossley conducted.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The month that is gone had been rich in promise, and the joys of realization far surpassed those of anticipation. Orchestral music has ruled supreme; Nikisch, with the London Symphony Orchestra, came and roused us to a high pitch of enthusiasm, though some of our pundits shook their heads at his reading of the Beethoven C minor, but much may be gained by contact with such a fresh and apprehensive mind. The performance of the Elgar 'Enigma' Variations served more fully to reveal those exceptional lyrical qualities which differentiate Nikisch from all other conductors.

The Hallé Orchestra at the eighteenth weekly concert, two days later, seemed fired by a spirit of emulation and gave us their best playing this season, Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony being done in surpassingly fine style, even for Richter, whilst the climax to the well-worn 'Tannhäuser' overture was simply overwhelming. As Nikisch had played several Wagnerian excerpts earlier in the week, it may not be too fanciful to trace this superb playing to a little friendly artistic rivalry between the two bodies, but whatever the cause, the Hallé men, in schoolboy parlance, certainly had 'bucked up.'

Bach's orchestral music invariably excites enthusiasm, and the repetition of the sixth 'Brandenburg' Concerto for viole, violoncelli and contrabassi, each divisi, well merited the prolonged applause. The performance was on a much higher level than that given a few weeks since, good though that had been, and generally the rendering had that repose which is born of more intimate acquaintance and thorough mastery.

There are two pianists who are always heard with delight here, Busoni and Siloti, and both invariably appear in chamber and orchestral music on successive evenings, and in each department are equally fine. Siloti, who came on March 3, may be ranked as one of the six or eight great pianists of the world, and nobody can better serve the student as a model; he gets at the heart of the music himself and then reveals it with perfect clarity to his hearers without any fuss or showy style; interpretative art can go no higher. He has often come here and played pianoforte music of every school, and the oftener one hears him the more do these salient features impress the listener.

Manchester's incurable conservatism in matters musical is responsible for the somewhat belated appearance of Strauss's 'Don Quixote,' which was given on March 3, and produced in the ranks of our musical public the now customary dissension as to its merits or demerits. It would do Manchester all the good in the world to be dosed with Strauss's Symphonic poems, as Henry J. Wood did the London 'Proms.' audiences two or three years ago, and there would be quite as much justification for giving the whole series of Straussian tone-poems as, say, 'The Immortal Nine'—nay more, for we do know our Beethoven well and we do not our Strauss.

The twentieth Hallé concert brought Cherubini's No. 4 Mass in C, Bach's a cappella motet 'Be not afraid,' and the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, which Richter almost invariably reserves to conclude a season in fitting style. The soloists engaged were Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Phyllis Lett, Messrs. John Harrison and Herbert Brown. The Mass did not receive an inspired rendering, but it may be doubted whether a modern audience could find it interesting in the deepest sense, whatever the conditions of the performance. The Bach motet raised in rather an acute form the question of the wisdom of one man preparing a choir in an a cappella work and then handing it over to a second man, however distinguished, for final performance. Judged by good standards, the Hallé choir did not sing it well; true and artistic economy of effort was not exercised, and when the great climaxes came there was no reserve of power on which to draw; the expression was often perfunctory, and this despite the use of an edition copiously provided with marks of expression. The best unaccompanied Bach singing in this part of the country has been heard from smaller bodies than the Hallé choir, which is practically of 'triennial festival' strength, and their repeated efforts in this class of work during the last few years almost force one to the conclusion that, of the larger bodies, only the most virtuosos ones can attain completely satisfactory results. The 'Choral Symphony' was brilliantly played, the choir sang this in really fine fashion, and the quartet of young soloists came through with flying colours.

The Hallé Orchestra Pension Fund concert on March 17 was the most glorious one of the season: a tremendous crowd, noble, unhackneyed music, and to crown all, the re-appearance of Muriel Foster (Mrs. Goetz)—as the programme wisely phrased it—in Brahms's Alto Rhapsody, and the three new Elgar songs, which Richter conducted for the first time. The unfailing beauty and wondrously expressive quality of her voice, a nobility of utterance blended with that rare quality of lofty serenity, and above all that supreme and priceless gift of Das Ewigweibliche pervading everything—these are some of the rare musical and emotional virtues of an art which is, unhappily, lost to the great musical public, apart perhaps from such an occasion as this one. Strauss's 'Don Quixote' variations were repeated after a fortnight's interval, and their reception by that vast crowd should silence effectually those detractors, who thought the applause which welcomed the first performance was merely complimentary, or an expression of pleasure that it was over and done with, and provided abundant confirmation of the views of those who have maintained that the more Strauss is played, the more will he be genuinely appreciated. Richter, as in 'Heldenleben' and 'Domestica,' toned down and softened those sections where cacophony is perpetrated for a definite, symbolical purpose. Might it be suggested that, as a consequence, the listener loses the heightened effects of the almost violent contrasts which Strauss designedly employs, thus presenting the work in a false perspective, and further, that Strauss, not being one of the suave, halcyonian types of composers needing pretty playing, can safely be left to stand or fall by his creations in their rude, rugged grandeur, for after all, when it becomes a question of characteristic beauty in veracity versus mere ornamental beauty, one will put up with a dash of surface eccentricity for the sheer joy of communing with such a thinker, such an interpreter of poetic and heroic types of humanity—great vital imaginations and such nobility of ideas are all too rare. And if we believe Art to be the 'expression of the souls of great men,' surely an open mind might be kept for the artist's message, no matter how he may express it. The performance was most noteworthy, at all points superior to the earlier one. Dr. Richter's enjoyment was obvious, and Messrs. Rawdon Briggs, Simon Speelman and Carl Fuchs distinguished themselves greatly. Mr. Frederic Dawson played with astonishing brilliancy in Tchaikovsky's B minor Pianoforte concerto, and so ended a memorable concert.

The last orchestral concert of the Gentlemen's series, conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood, enabled us to hear much music which otherwise would have remained unknown to Manchester, as the Hallé Society apparently does not consider the modern French School, say, as coming legitimately within its sphere. This is an age of specialization, and Dr. Richter, rightly enough, probably prefers to stick to his classics, but in art, whether pictorial, plastic, literary or musical, progressive communities cannot wisely remain ignorant of current developments either at home or abroad, so it may be counted to the Gentlemen's Committee for righteousness that they have enabled Mr. Wood to introduce us to works by Debussy, Charpentier's 'Impressions d'Italie,' the Dukas Scherzo from 'L'Apprenti Sorcier,' &c. There is now an almost unexampled opportunity to keep us abreast of modern French musical thought in a wisely co-ordinated scheme of orchestral concerts in the Hallé and Gentlemen's series, which shall do much to remove the reproach under which Manchester has long laboured, of being out of touch with some present-day musical tendencies.

The concerts of chamber music, whilst not so numerous as in the previous month, have been of exceptional interest. At the third Brodsky Quartet concert, Volkmann's Quartet in E flat (Op. 43) and Dr. Esposito's second Sonata in E minor for violin and pianoforte were both heard for the first time in this city, Beethoven's wonderful Septuor completing the programme, the regular players being joined by Messrs. Mills (clarinet), Paersch (horn), Schieder (bassoon), and Hoffmann (double-bass). Dr. Esposito shared the honours with Dr. Brodsky in the Sonata, which was most warmly received; and the Scherzo of the Septuor had to be repeated. Alexander Siloti was the visiting pianist at the fourth Brodsky concert, playing Grieg's No. 3 Sonata in C minor, in association with his old friend Brodsky, their reading being of quite absorbing interest. Mozart's Quintet in C major (the second viola part played by Mr. Alfred Barker) and the Beethoven F major Quartet (Op. 59) made up the programme. The Brodsky Quartet are great in Haydn and Mozart, in Tchaikovsky, Dvorák and Brahms, but anyone who would gauge their real greatness must hear their Beethoven performances.

In some respects Mr. Max Mayer's second concert of his twenty-first season will stand out as the most notable chamber music concert of the year, for we had Max Reger's Variations and Fugue for two pianofortes on a Beethoven theme, the most considerable work of this writer yet given here, and the unusual, but most sensible course was adopted of playing the work twice over, thus enabling its real significance to be more fully grasped by every listener. Mr. Mayer and Mr. Petri succeeded in avoiding all tendency to harshness, and made Reger's complex and audacious harmonic progressions come out with perfect clearness. The second performance surpassed the earlier one, and the imposing grandeur of the climax in the fugue section made a very deep impression.

Mr. Tobias Matthay delivered a lecture on 'Some essential principles in the teaching of Interpretation,' on March 3, to Dr. Carroll's Teachers' Association.

Mention of several other interesting events must be reserved until next month.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

Most dignified and noble was the rendering Nikisch gave of Beethoven's fifth Symphony, with the London Symphony Orchestra, at the last Harrison concert on March 1. A brilliant performance of Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations was another item of special interest.

A novelty at the concert of the Newcastle Musical Society on the next evening was J. Friskin's Quintet in C minor for pianoforte (Mr. A. Procter) and strings (Messrs. A. Wall, J. Young and A. Hervé, and Miss Hetty Page). It is too large a work to criticise in detail on a single hearing. Mr. Ernest J. Potts, a local bass, sang finely songs of Purcell, Wolf and Dvorák.

On March 9 the first performance of Bach's 'Magnificat' was given here by the Postal Telegraph Choral Society. The difficult choruses were sung in a very spirited and enthusiastic manner by the choir, which also enhanced its reputation by charming renderings of madrigals and folk-songs. The accompaniments of the Magnificat were played by a string orchestra and organ. Brahms's second set of 'Liebeslieder' waltzes formed part of the programme. The solo vocalists were Misses E. Jackson, I. Walton, Mrs. A. Wall, and Mr. F. Hosking. Miss Guthrie was the accompanist. Mr. E. L. Bainton, the conductor, is to be congratulated on the progress of the Society.

The following evening, the Jesmond Wesleyan Choir gave a concert of folk-songs under the conductorship of Mr. J. Heywood, and the Armstrong College Choral Society held its annual concert in the hall of the College. The works performed were Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day,' Bach's Church Cantata 'Give the hungry man thy bread' and two choruses by Schubert. The soloists were Misses L. and R. Buckley and Mr. E. J. Potts, and the accompaniments were played on two pianofortes by Mr. G. W. Danskin (the accompanist of the Society) and Mr. J. J. Hobkirk. Three songs composed by the new principal of the College, Dr. Hadow, were sung by Miss F. Buckley, with the composer at the pianoforte. The energetic choir of Elswick Road Wesleyan Church celebrated their choir festival with excellent performances of Sterndale Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria,' on Sunday, March 13, and Handel's 'Israel in Egypt,' on Wednesday, March 16. Mr. George Dodds conducted.

Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman' and the last scene of the 'Meistersinger' formed the programme of the Choral Union concert on March 15. The orchestra was the Leeds Symphony, and Dr. Coward conducted. The soloists were Madame Sapio, Miss Kate Lloyd, Messrs. J. Reed, Herbert Brown, Herbert Parker, and E. J. Potts.

On March 16, Mr. Fairs conducted a huge programme given by the Shields Choral Society, when Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'Bon-bon Suite,' Dvorák's 'Carneval' Overture and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony were performed.

NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

Miss Margaret Bennett, an Associate of the R.A.M., gave a successful pianoforte recital in Stone Town Hall, on March 3, when she worthily upheld the prestige of her Alma mater.

The North Staffordshire District Choral Society gave their Spring concert on the evening of March 10, in the Victoria Hall, Hanley. Since the death of the former conductor, the late Mr. James Whewall, matters have been somewhat disturbed. In less than two months two temporary choirmasters have handled the helm with a view to steering it from troubled waters. For the Spring concert the president of the Society, Mr. Thomas W. Twyford, who has done much for music in North Staffordshire, was instrumental in bringing Dr. W. G. McNaught to conduct. There was no orchestra, the choral items being sung either unaccompanied or accompanied by the pianoforte. Probably owing to various vagaries following upon the late conductor's death, the choice of selection in choral works was not a strong one, the best numbers being Bantock's 'Awake, awake,' Smart's 'Song of the seasons' and Schubert's 'The Lord is my Shepherd' for female voices. Dr. McNaught, who had only one rehearsal, did all that was possible with the programme, several numbers of which were encored. Miss Lucy Nuttall, Mr. Robert Radford, Mr. Charles Kelly (pianist) contributed solos, and Mrs. Emery and Mr. William Sherratt shared the duties of accompanists. The latter also gave a number of acceptable organ solos.

At the invitation of Mr. George Wade, the Chairman of the Burslem School Board, an invitation was given to Dr. McNaught to deliver his lecture upon 'Musical Rhythm and the child,' before the teachers under the Burslem School Board. The lecture was delivered on March 11, in the Burslem Town Hall, before a large and interested audience. Excellent school part-song singing was given by a choir of juveniles from the various schools under Mr. Cocolough, music teacher to the Board, preparatory to the lecture itself. The principal demonstration by the lecturer, which was carried out under his direction by a number of children seated at a table, facing him on the platform, was that nature has given largely to the child-mind a natural instinct for musical pitch, rhythmic accent and balance. The contention of the lecturer was that these natural gifts should be used in preference to the present cramming of dry-as-dust exercises which largely stultify instead of develop the musical faculty in the child. The lecture was followed with rapt attention, and at its close Mr. George Wade, on behalf of the Burslem Education Committee, thanked Dr. McNaught, and expressed a wish that he would return at an early date to deliver one or more lectures.

The Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society gave their annual Spring concert in the Victoria Hall, Hanley, on March 14. The principal item was Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' which had previously not been heard for a number of years in this district. An excellent performance must be recorded, and went to prove that in Mr. John James the Society has a conductor who will, given opportunities, go far in his profession. Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Harold Wilde and Mr. Robert Burnett were a fine quartet of principals. The 'Choral Symphony' (Beethoven) was advertised to be performed, and although the intention was not stated inside the programme book, only the Finale was given. Dvorák's 'Carneval overture' was also played very finely by the Hallé Orchestra, and caused an excellent impression by the manner and grip Mr. James displayed in the performance. Mr. Ernest Hammond presided at the organ, and Mr. John James is to be congratulated on the artistic results as a whole.

There is much speculation in the air as to what will take place in the Potteries following upon federation of the various towns into the city of Stoke-upon-Trent. Hanley possesses a fine Town Hall, admitted by artists to be one of the finest concert-rooms in the country and capable of seating an audience of 3,500. The federation Act comes into force on April 1, and prior to this Burslem and Stoke-upon-Trent had each commenced building a new Town Hall. Each of them is to cost £30,000, and both are designed largely for concert purposes: the Stoke Hall is to have a larger seating capacity than the present Victoria Hall, Hanley, and it has been stated by the gentleman (Alderman Geen) who has carried out the Stoke project, that the new Town Hall will be opened with a several days' musical festival. Whatever else may be said of the Potteries, it will soon outrival the rest of the country in the matter of fine concert rooms.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The second orchestral concert given by the Sacred Harmonic Society took place on March 3, when the programme contained Schumann's B flat Symphony, the Overtures to 'Egmont' and the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F. The performance of the symphony was an improvement on that of the last occasion, but was lacking in purity of intonation and sympathy. Miss Caroline Hatchard was the vocalist, and gave a fine performance of excerpts from Mozart and Gounod. Elgar's 'King Olaf' was given on March 8 by the Long Eaton Choral Society. The work received a praiseworthy performance. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Charles Trec. The band and chorus of 150 performers were directed by Mr. J. S. Derbyshire, and the band was led by Mr. Fred. Mountney, with Mr. E. Smeeton as accompanist.

A chamber concert was given on March 8 by Miss Rowena Goldberg (pianoforte), Mr. Carl Zimmer (violin), Miss Mary Thorpe (viola), Mr. Edwin Thorpe (violinello) and Mr. Downing (vocalist). The features of the programme were Schumann's Quartet in E flat (Op. 47), Fantasiestücke for violinello, and two songs.

Mr. William Woolley's Choral Society (Nottingham) gave an admirable performance of part-singing on the same day, when the programme contained excellent examples from works by Elgar, Cornelius, Brahms, Coleridge-Taylor, Eaton Faning and Granville Bantock. Miss Lizzie Parsons contributed two pianoforte solos.

The Nottingham Evening School Choral Union and Orchestral Society gave a good account of themselves on March 12 in Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' under Mr. Arthur Richards' direction.

The last of the Nottingham Subscription Concerts took place on March 16, when Miss Ida Newman and Mr. George Henschel were the soloists, Miss Katherine Goodson was pianist, and the London Wood-wind Quintette, the instrumentalists. Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' brought the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society's work for the season to a close, on March 17. The performance was one of the most enjoyable of the season. Miss Edith Evans, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Charles Knowles, were the soloists, and all contributed to the excellence of the performance, but Miss Wright, who was a new-comer, deserves an extra word of praise. The choir did excellently, under Mr. Allen Gill's baton. Dr. Lyon's work for chorus and orchestra, 'Oh, how blest are ye,' received an enthusiastic reception, and the composer was called, and acknowledged the keen appreciation of his grateful composition.

OXFORD.

On January 27, Mr. Lawrence Fry gave an excellent recital on the organ in the Town Hall, his principal items being Mozart's Fantasia in F minor, Guilmant's Sonata in D minor (No. 1), and Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C major. Between the pieces Madame Ada Crossley and Mr. Campbell McInnes sang several songs, which largely contributed to the enjoyment of the evening.

On February 3, in the same building, an orchestral concert was given under the auspices of the Musical Club, the strings being local and the wind from the London Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Allen's experienced baton. The chief items were Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto in E flat (No. 5, Op. 73), the solo part being capably played by Mr. F. S. Kelly, and Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' symphony in B minor (No. 6), the production of which was looked forward to with keen interest, as it was to be given for the first time in Oxford. Space does not allow us to go into details, but the performance as a whole was exceedingly good.

On February 8, in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall, Miss Marie Brema gave a very charming concert. Amongst other things, Miss Brema sang Schubert's 'Erl König' and 'The Blacksmith,' by Brahms, while Mr. Bromilow contributed Schubert's 'Die Forelle' and 'Eleanor' by Mallinson. Miss Marjorie Adam played Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor with great clearness and in thoroughly excellent style.

On February 23, in the Town Hall, and under the auspices of the Musical Club, the Choral and Philharmonic Society and the Bach Choir combined gave the concert of the term. The chief works were Mozart's 'Requiem Mass' (Nos. 1-8) and Beethoven's great Mass in D major (Op. 123). The solos were entrusted to Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Sara Silvers, Mr. Charles Child and Mr. Hamilton Harris. The choir worked hard and well, but experienced in the Beethoven Mass especially some trying and even critical moments. Under Dr. Allen's energetic conducting, however, they came safely out of the ordeal, and the performance gave great pleasure to a large audience.

On March 8, in the Sheldonian Theatre, the professor of music (Sir Walter Parratt) discoursed pleasantly on 'Glees.' He explained with great care the meaning of the term 'Glee,' and said that they were originally written for men's voices only, that they were never intended to be sung by more than one voice to each part, and that they should be unaccompanied. He regretted that Sir Henry Bishop's efforts to reinstate the glee were not successful: by his adding accompaniments to them, and encouraging several voices to sing each part—both of which were errors of judgment—he made their performance resemble the part-song. The illustrations, which included 'By Celia's arbour,' were given by local amateurs and were much enjoyed.

We must not omit to mention that the Sunday evening concerts have been continued at Balliol College during the term, under the able direction of Dr. Walker.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The excellent work done by Mr. H. C. Jackson with the new Victoria Hall Choral Society found proof in a spirited performance of 'The Creation' on March 10.

On March, 17 Mr. T. Brameld directed a performance of Haydn's 'The Seasons' by the Rotherham Choral Society. There was a competent orchestra, the principals were capable, and the singing of the choir was as always enthusiastic and sure.

Mr. L. Chadwick, whose efforts have brought reviving fortunes to the Wincobank and Blackburn Harmonic Society, directed his zealous chorists in an admirable and well-studied performance of Gaul's 'The Holy City.'

Among interesting choral concerts of the past month were those of the Chapelton and District Harmonic Society (Handel's 'Samson'), conducted by Mr. M. Thompson, and the Hillsbro' Choral Society, who performed Bridge's 'Flag of England' and Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis night,' under the guidance of Mr. F. Shemeld.

In furtherance of the scheme for establishing orchestral music in Sheffield, two more successful promenade concerts have been given in the Albert Hall. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted an orchestra of sixty in Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 (which proved greatly to the taste of the large audience), a series of selections from Wagner's music-dramas and operas, Grieg's A minor Pianoforte concerto (soloist, Mr. Edward Isaacs), Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto No. 3 (soloist, Miss Marjorie Hayward), and other works, mostly modern and fresh to Sheffield. Miss Eva Rich and Mr. J. Lycett were the vocalists.

By a slip of the pen, Mendelssohn's 'Forty-second Psalm,' was last month named as the work sung by the St. Andrew's (Sharrow) Choral Society; it should have been Barnett's 'Ancient Mariner.'

During the past month interesting chamber music has been played by the London Wood-wind Quintet, and the Brodsky Quartet. The latter played works by Volkmann, Mozart and Beethoven.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

This is always a busy month, and Easter falling early has made it busier than ever, all the musical societies hastening to end their season before the holiday time. At Leeds the three principal series of concerts have afforded an amusing indication of how the wind of popularity blows, all of them giving Wagner programmes by way of a brilliant conclusion to the season. The Leeds Choral Union came first, on March 9, and gave the third act of 'Tannhäuser,' together with a version of 'The Flying Dutchman,' reduced, by somewhat drastic and crudely executed cuts, to the dimensions of a half-programme cantata. Under Dr. Coward's direction, it followed that the brilliance and force of the choral singing was the prominent feature of the performance. It was, however, effective, if scarcely 'legitimate.' Madame De Vere-Sapio, Mr. Seth Hughes, and Mr. Lewys James, all of the Moody-Manners Company, were practised representatives of the principal parts, and in minor ones Miss Dews and Mrs. Bland were most efficient. The Leeds Philharmonic Society's Wagner concert, on March 16, was given with the invaluable help of Dr. Richter, and included extracts from 'The Flying Dutchman,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Die Walküre,' and 'Die Meistersinger.' The principals were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Barron Derthold, and Mr. Robert Radford, who have all been associated with the Covent Garden Wagner performances, so that artistic success was assured.

At the preceding concert of the same series, on February 23, Mr. Fricker conducted the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music and Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' in both of which his well-trained chorus appeared to advantage, singing with genuine refinement of style. Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Frank Mullings, a young tenor of exceptional promise, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth were the principals, and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra performed its share most efficiently.

The Municipal Concerts on February 26 paid a suitable tribute to the Schumann Centenary, the programme including the 'Genoveva' overture, the D minor Symphony, and the Concertstück in G (Op. 92), the solo part in which was played with great delicacy and sympathy by a promising young debutante, Miss Kathleen Smith, who also played the fourth Novelette and some other solos in a very fluent, refined fashion. The programme of the last concert of the series, on March 12, was given up to Wagner and Tchaikovsky, the 'Pathetic' Symphony being the most important piece, and being played irreproachably by the orchestra, which has become a thoroughly efficient body. The season of ten concerts has resulted in a loss of £42, which will doubtless be made good by private effort, since the Corporation not only refuse any subsidy, but have announced their intention of charging £50 for the use of the hall, though in the absence of these concerts it would be employed for free organ recitals, and the cost of lighting and cleaning would fall on the municipality. It is hoped, however, that they may not insist on this dog-in-the-manger policy.

Yet another orchestral concert has to be chronicled on March 2, when Mr. Nikisch and the London Symphony Orchestra came to Leeds in the course of their tour in connection with Mr. Harrison's concerts. On such occasions one realises the utmost limits of orchestral virtuosity, but in addition to this Mr. Nikisch gave a reading of Beethoven's C minor Symphony which was not only brilliant, but artistic and convincing. Both here, and at Bradford on the following night, the audiences were by no means worthy of the occasion, which is regrettable, but perhaps unavoidable when the ground is already occupied by regular series of orchestral concerts. On March 8 the Leeds Symphony Society, an amateur organization conducted by Mr. A. E. Grimshaw, gave a concert which included creditable performances of Haydn's Symphony in D (from the Salomon set) and Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise, in which the solo pianist was Miss Minnie Taylor. On March 21, the Holy Week Service at which Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion' has for many years been given, took place at the Leeds Parish Church, under Dr. Bairstow's direction.

Among the chamber concerts there have to be recorded two Leeds Bohemians, on March 7, when Grieg's G minor Quartet and Mozart's in D (from the King of Prussia's set) were given, and March 18, when the programme included Quartets by Beethoven (Op. 131) and Schubert (in D minor), with Dvorák's Pianoforte quintet (with Mr. Julian Clifford as the pianist). On February 21 Mr. Montagu-Nathan, a Leeds violinist, gave a recital, with the co-operation of Mr. Willibald Richter, at which sonatas by Raff, Grieg, and Strauss were played, and on February 28 Miss Ella Child, a young pianist who has been studying under Busoni, gave a recital at which she played with remarkable brilliance a most unhackneyed and interesting programme of pieces by Liszt, Debussy, and her latest master. At the last of Messrs. Haddock's musical evenings on March 15, Mr. Zacharewitsch gave a violin recital.

BRADFORD.

The Bradford subscription concerts brought their season to a close on March 11 with an exceptionally fine performance of the 'Choral Symphony,' in which Richter showed once again his power as a Beethoven conductor, giving a reading which was instinct with virile force and breadth, while the details were most finished. The Festival Choral Society was thoroughly well versed in its task, and Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. J. Harrison and Mr. Herbert Brown formed a capable quartet. By way of preparation the committee had thoughtfully provided their subscribers with a lecture on the symphony, by Dr. Ernest Walker, a couple of days beforehand, and his keen and fearless criticism of the famous work must have proved of great assistance in its appreciation. Another feature of this concert was Mr. Herbert Brown's forceful singing of a remarkable bass recitative and air from Bach's cantata, 'Wachet, betet,' a very interesting example of the composer's efforts after a vivid characterization. On February 25 the Bradford Festival Choral Society gave Parker's 'Hora Novissima' and Goring Thomas's 'Swan and Skylark,' under Dr. Cowen's direction. The programme was an excellent one, the works being in striking contrast, and the performance was above the average, the choir singing with intelligence and spirit. Miss Hilda de Angelis, Miss Lucy Nuttall, Messrs. Webster Millar and Ivor Foster were the principals. On March 8 the Bradford Old Choral Society gave a capital performance of Handel's 'Samson,' the choir being very fresh and alert. The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Verena Fancourt, Mr. Cynlans Gibbs and Mr. Joseph Lycett, and Mr. E. J. Pickles conducted. Two of the Permanent Orchestra's Concerts have to be chronicled, on February 19 and March 5. On the former occasion we had a 'centenary programme,' which included pieces by great masters who were working a hundred years ago, and others whose birth occurred in the same period. At the latter concert the programme was selected by vote of the subscribers, whose choice fell on Brahms's 'Hungarian Dances,' the 'Casse Noisette' suite, 'William Tell' overture, 'Pomp and Circumstance' march, 'Meistersinger' overture, Dvorák's 'Humoreske' (as scored by Dr. Cowen), and the two middle movements of the 'Pathetic' Symphony, in the order named. The vocalists were Miss Carrie Birkbeck, who in an air from the 'Magic Flute' showed excellent voice and technique, and Mr. Walter Mason, a promising baritone. Mr. Allen Gill conducted on both occasions. On March 15, Miss Edith Robinson's string quartet, with Mr. Cohn as pianist, gave a chamber concert at which works by Mozart, Schumann and Brahms were produced, and on the 16th Mr. Stott conducted Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' at a special service in All Saints' Church.

OTHER TOWNS.

At Hull, the Symphony Orchestra, whose approaching dissolution was mentioned a month ago, gave its last concert on February 23, when Mozart's E flat Symphony was the chief thing in the programme. Mr. Wallerstein, whose departure from Hull has precipitated the end of these concerts, conducted, and sundry presentations to him marked the occasion. On March 4 the Hull Harmonic Society, under Mr. Porter, gave Elgar's 'Caractacus' for the first time at Hull. Miss Jenny Taggart, Mr. James Davis, Mr. H. Ellis, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth were the principals in a performance which, though it lacked finish, was at least good in intention. On March 11 the Hull Philharmonic, of which Mr. J. W. Hudson is conductor, gave an orchestral concert, of which the chief feature was Raff's 'Lenore' Symphony. The 'German Requiem' of Brahms and Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens' formed a distinguished programme for the concert of the Hull Vocal Society on March 15, under Dr. G. H. Smith's direction. The principals were Miss Betty Booker and Mr. Francis Harford. The occasion was of special interest in that it marked the conclusion of sixty years' work since this Society was formed.

At Halifax the Orchestral Society's concert introduced Haydn's Symphony in D (from the Salomon set), of which Mr. Van Dyk gave a reading highly creditable to an amateur orchestra, the strings in particular giving evidence of careful preparation. On the 17th, the Halifax Choral Society gave a concert, the programme of which included 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'Acis and Galatea,' with Miss Ethel Lister, Mr. H. Brearley and Mr. J. Lycett as principals. Mr. F. de G. English conducted.

The Huddersfield Choral Society, on March 4, gave the whole of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' trilogy. Under Dr. Coward's conductorship the fine choir gave a reading which was perhaps rather too spasmodically expressive, but was in its robust way unsurpassable. The soloists, Miss Esta d'Arco, Mr. Heather, and Mr. Charles Tree, had less chance of distinction, and got through their task very creditably under the circumstances. The Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society gave one of its usual miscellaneous programmes, under Mr. Pearson's direction, on March 8. The Huddersfield Subscription Concert on March 1 was of quite exceptional interest, Dr. Richter bringing the Hallé Orchestra over, and conducting Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, which had never before been heard in the town. The final concert of the season, on March 22, was of purely local interest, being given entirely by musicians of the town, and calculated to display its resources to advantage. At Dewsbury, where music of any importance has been in a state of stagnation since the local choral society came to an end through lack of support, Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was given—in Mr. Crowe's English dress—under the direction of Mr. G. H. Hirst, the organist, whose work as conductor of the defunct Choral Society is not forgotten. Miss Hirst, Miss Watts, Messrs. Fallas, Blackburn, and Kemp were the soloists, and Mr. Bernard Johnson's artistic organ accompaniment went far to atone for the absence of an orchestra.

At Keighley the Orchestral Society's concert, on March 2, introduced Haydn's 'Farewell' Symphony, with all the traditional effects, and some Wagner pieces, which were creditably performed under the direction of Mr. Summercales, who also conducted the Keighley Musical Society's performance of Parry's 'Judith,' on March 15. The York Musical Society, on March 14, gave an interesting performance of 'The dream of Gerontius,' which may be regarded as a full-dress rehearsal for the festival which it is proposed to give in York next July. The principals were Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. William Waite, and Mr. T. Tertius Noble, who conducted most ably, may be congratulated on a very sympathetic reading of the work. A miscellaneous programme given by the Scarborough Philharmonic Society on March 8, under Dr. Ely's conductorship, included some interesting part-songs, and solos by Miss Norah McKay, an artistic young violinist.

At a time of such activity it is impossible to do more than mention some of the concerts in smaller centres, by societies which are doing excellent work. The Morley Choral Society, a very enterprising body, gave a miscellaneous concert on March 7, under Mr. Fricker, the programme of which included Parry's 'Song of Darkness and Light' and Coleridge-Taylor's three choral ballads, together with Haydn's graceful motet, 'Insanæ et vanæ curæ.' The Pudsey Choral Union chose for its concert, on March 13, Parry's 'St. Cecilia's Day,' which Mr. H. H. Pickard conducted, and the Ilkley Vocal Society, of which Mr. Akeroyd is the conductor, gave on March 17 'The Song of Destiny' and 'The Revenge.' A Chopin recital was given at Ilkley on February 24 by Mr. Cohn, who played with great brilliance a most comprehensive series of representative pieces by the composer, whose centenary it was thus intended to celebrate.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

M. Jean Nougues' opera, 'Quo vadis' has been successfully performed for the first time at the Theatre Royal.—On March 2, Vincent d'Indy's interesting orchestral trilogy 'Wallenstein' (after Schiller's tragedy) was played at the symphony concerts conducted by M. Edw. Keurwels.

BARCELONA.

The Liceo Theatre recently produced Richard Strauss's opera 'Salome' for the first time in Spain. This extraordinary work achieved a great success under Herr Beidler's conductorship. The title-part was taken by Madame Gemma Bellincioni, who made a deep impression, chiefly by her wonderful acting.

BERLIN.

At the Imperial Opera House, Meyerbeer's opera 'Der Prophet' has been revived after a rest of eight years. The opera, which affords great opportunities for stage display, was presented with an excellent mise-en-scène, which culminated in the famous skating scene.—The programme of the seventh symphony concert of the Königliche Kapelle (conductor, Dr. Richard Strauss) contained, besides Beethoven's 'Egmont' overture and Schubert's C major Symphony, the conductor's own symphonic poem, 'Don Quixote.' The latter work was on this occasion heard for the first time at these concerts.—Saint-Saëns's third Symphony in C minor (Op. 78) and Georg Schumann's 'Variationen und Fuge über ein lustiges Thema' figured in the programme of the ninth Philharmonic concert conducted by Professor Arthur Nikisch. On the same occasion Frau Preuse Metzner sang Gernsheim's rarely heard scena 'Agrippina.'—At the sixth concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Granville Bantock's overture 'The Pierrot of the Minute' was given for the first time in Berlin, under the baton of Herr Oscar Friedl, who on this occasion also produced an interesting orchestral Prelude and double Fugue of his own composition.—Sibelius's third Symphony in C major was the novelty of Herr Josef Stransky's fourth 'Symphonischer Musikabend,' the programme of which also included Liszt's 'Prometheus.'—At the eighteenth Symphony concert of the Blüthner Orchestra, which was this time conducted by Dr. Georg Göhler, from Leipzig, Enrico Bossi's 'Tema e variazioni,' Op. 131, were heard for the first time.—Philipp Scharwenka's new 'Symphonia brevis' was successfully produced at the third concert given by the Dutch Trio.—Herr Gustav Bumcke, who has for several years done much to arouse the interest of the musical public in chamber music for wind instruments, gave an interesting concert, at which his own compositions 'Der Spaziergang' (for wind instruments and harp) and two songs, Op. 25 (with accompaniment for twelve wind instruments and harp), were heard for the first time and much appreciated. Another interesting item in the programme was a Divertissement for two flutes, oboe, clarinet, French horns and bassoon, by the French composer Emile Bernard.—Two interesting novelties, Wilhelm Berger's 'Sturmesmythe,' an eight-part cappella chorus, and three Stimmungsbilder entitled 'Raffael,' for chorus, orchestra and organ, by Fritz Volbach, were performed for the first time at the concerts of the Königlicher Opernchor.

BRESLAU.

In the presence of the composer, Max Reger's 100th Psalm was performed for the first time by the Breslauer Singakademie (conductor Dr. Georg Dohrn). The work, which is in three parts, the third part being a double Fugue with the Choral 'Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott' as cantus firmus, made a considerable impression.

BRUSSELS.

On March 7 a new opera entitled 'Eros vainqueur,' composed by Pierre de Bréville to the libretto of Jean Lorrain, was successfully produced at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie.—The name of Richard Strauss occupied most of the programme of the fourth Concert Populaire given on March 13, under the conductorship of M. Sylvain Dupuis. Besides his symphonic poems 'Tod und Verklärung' and 'Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche,' the great monologue from 'Elektra' (impressively rendered by Madame Thila Plaichinger) was heard for the first time.

COPENHAGEN.

On February 27, the Royal Theatre revived J. P. E. Hartmann's delightful national opera 'Liden Kirsten.' The previous evening Wagner's 'Meistersinger' was performed for the fiftieth time. The work was first given in Copenhagen on March 23, 1872, but then proved a failure, and remained in the archives for thirty years before it was again revived, this time with great success.

CREFELD.

A one-act opera, 'Der Spion,' composed by Rudolf Brenner, was well received on its production at the Municipal Theatre.

DESSAU.

The fairy opera 'Das Glück,' by Freiherr von Prochazka, was successfully performed for the first time at the Court Theatre.

DRESDEN.

The comic opera 'Robins Ende,' by Eduard Künneke, achieved a decided success on the occasion of its première at the Royal Opera House. An interesting feature of the second musical evening of the Tonkünstlerverein was Wolf-Ferrari's 'Kammersymphonie,' Op. 8, for pianoforte, two violins, viola, violoncello, contrabass, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and French horn.

DORTMUND.

On March 13, the oratorio 'Von den Tageszeiten,' by Friedrich E. Koch, was performed for the first time at the concert of the Musikalische Gesellschaft.

DÜSSELDORF.

Felix Gottthelf's mystery play 'Mahadeva' was given in its entirety for the first time on March 7. The work, part of which was performed at the last Tonkünstlerversammlung in Stuttgart, had a favourable reception.

ELBERFELD.

On February 16 a four-act opera 'Alroy,' by the English composer, Bernard de Lisle, was produced at the Municipal Theatre. The libretto, by Paul Grünfeld, is an adaptation of a novel by Lord Beaconsfield. The music, in which old Hebrew tunes have been cleverly used, has many merits, and the work on the whole proved very successful.

FRANKFURT.

At the tenth Friday concert of the Museumsgesellschaft, Richard Strauss's early Symphony in F minor was an interesting item in the programme. His opera 'Salome' was recently performed for the twenty-fifth time at the Opera House. Dr. Strauss, who on this occasion conducted, was accorded an enthusiastic ovation.

HAGEN (WESTPHALIA).

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert of the Municipal Orchestra (conductor, Herr Robert Langs), included the following novelties: Symphonic poem 'Hero and Leander,' by Paul Ertel, the Prelude to 'Eine Lebensmesse,' by Jan van Gilse, Gerhard Schjelderup's 'Sonnenaufgang über Himalaya,' d'Ambrosio's Violin concerto, and the Prelude 'L'après midi d'un faune,' by Debussy.

THE HAGUE.

The first performance here of Richard Strauss's opera 'Elektra' was recently given with great success.

HALLE.

Handel's rarely-heard oratorio 'Joseph' was performed by the Hallsche Singakademie on February 23. The assertion that this was the first German performance of the work was incorrect, as the Berliner Singakademie gave performances of the oratorio between 1839 and 1861.

HAMBURG.

At the Municipal Opera House, Wolf-Ferrari's comic opera 'Susannens Geheimnis' was successfully performed for the first time. Herr Gustav Brecher, who conducted, brought out the fine musicality of this clever score with great ability.

LEIPSIK.

At the nineteenth Gewandhaus Concert, Professor Nikisch produced successfully a 'Fest Vorspiel,' by Emil Robert Hansen (solo violoncellist of the Orchestra). At the same concert, Franz Lachner's now very rarely played second Suite was given.—Felix Draeseke's 'Penthesilea-Vorspiel,' and Enrico Bossi's 'Tema e Variazioni,' were heard for the first time at the fifth subscription concert of the Musikalische Gesellschaft (conductor Dr. Georg Göhler).—At his orchestral concert, the violinist, Professor Felix Berber introduced Max Schillings's new Violin concerto, and the 'Poème' (second concerto) by E. Jaques-Dalcroze. The latter work constitutes a very valuable addition to violin literature.—Arnold Mendelssohn's choral work 'Pandora' was given for the first time at the last concert of the Lehrgesangsverein.—Saint-Saëns's Biblical legend 'Le Déluge' and Karl Bleyle's choral work 'Lernt lachen' formed the programme of the ninth Philharmonic concert.—Schubert's Deutsches 'Stabat Mater' (composed in 1816 to words by Klopstock) and Bruckner's Mass in F minor were excellently performed for the first time in Leipzig at the Bustagsconcert of the Riedelverein.

MADRID.

At the Teatro Reale, Wagner's 'Rheingold' was recently given for the first time in Spain, the work creating a very powerful impression.—At the same theatre the first performance here of Strauss's opera 'Salome' took place, on February 16, under the able musical direction of Herr Walter Rabl. The work had an enthusiastic reception.

MAGDEBURG.

Siegfried Wagner's latest opera, 'Banadietrich,' was recently given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre.—At a concert of the Philharmonic Society, Philipp Scharwenka's new 'Symphonia brevis' was performed for the first time, under the composer's direction.

MONTE CARLO.

Massenet's new opera 'Don Quichotte,' to the libretto of Henri Cain, was produced at the Opera on February 11. The work achieved a great success, and is said to show the composer at his best. The title-part was most excellently interpreted by the famous Russian baritone, M. Feodor Chialapin.

MUNICH.

Several interesting works, among them Liszt's Symphonic poem 'Hunnenschlacht,' Richard Strauss's 'Heldenleben,' and the 'Istar' Variations by Vincent d'Indy, have lately figured in the programmes of the concerts of the Musikalische Akademie. The conductor, Herr Mottl, recently produced a Symphony in E major (Op. 36) by Beer-Waldbraun. On the same occasion, Hofkonzertmeister Ahner played for the first time a new Violin concerto (Op. 10) by Karl Bleyle.—Mahler's fifth Symphony was played for the first time in Munich, at a concert of the Concertverein, under the conductorship of Herr Ferdinand Löwe.

PARIS.

Two novelties were produced at the Grand Opéra on February 16. They were the two-act musical legend 'Le Forêt' (text by Laurent Failade), composed by Augustin Savard, and Reynaldo Hahn's ballet 'La Fête chez Thérèse' (book by Catulle Mendès). The first work did not show any great merit, but the ballet contains many beautiful pages, and obtained a great success.—On February 20 an excellent performance of Beethoven's great Mass in D was given at the Conservatoire concerts.—On the same day a new orchestral composition by Debussy, 'L'Ibéria,' was produced at the Colonne concerts. This interesting work is in three parts, severally entitled: 'Par les Rues et par les Chemins,' 'Les Parfums de la Nuit,' and 'Le Matin d'un Jour de Fête.'—André Gedalge's new Symphony (No. 3) was successfully produced on the following Sunday (February 27) at the same concerts.—On March 6, Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony and the new 'Symphonie française' by Théodore Dubois were heard for the first time at the Conservatoire and Colonne concerts respectively.

STUTTGART.

Karl von Kaskel's new one-act opera, 'Die Nachtigall,' was favourably received on its recent production at the Court Theatre.—At the seventh concert of the Hofkapelle, Bruckner's eighth Symphony was given, under Herr Max Schillings's baton, for the first time. The work made so great an impression that it was repeated at the ninth concert.

TOULOUSE.

The Symphonic-poem 'Orpheus,' by Liszt, and a 'Symphonie sur un choral breton,' by Guy-Ropartz, figured in the programme of the fourth Conservatoire concert.

TURIN.

At the Teatro Regio, Don Giocondo Fino's opera 'La festa del grano,' was well received at its recent production.

WIESBADEN.

An early composition of Richard Strauss, the Symphonic phantasy 'Aus Italien,' was lately performed, after a long rest, under the musical direction of Herr Afferni.

The German 'Sprachverein,' or Language Association, celebrated their eleventh anniversary on March 12, at the Holborn Viaduct Hotel, under the presidency of Professor Dr. Weiss. For the occasion a Richard Wagner lecture and concert had been arranged. Herr Professor A. G. Haltenhoff dwelt in his lecture on the German legends and mythology as far as Wagner used them for his music-dramas, and showed the great influence they had on the composer's works. The subsequent musical programme contained vocal passages from Wagner's operas. Santa's ballad from the 'Flying Dutchman' was sung with great charm and artistic feeling by Miss Gwladys Edwards, and other vocalists were Mr. Joseph Ireland and Mr. Reginald Borough, the latter with Miss Edwards singing the final scene between Wotan and Brinnhilde from 'Walküre.' Mr. W. Murdoch played some pianoforte solos. These artists were all English but sang in German, and gave the assembled German members of the Society a further proof that Wagner is as well appreciated in England as in their own country.

A performance of 'Wat,' a three-act play described as an Elizabethan Masque, was given at the Cripplegate Institute on March 14. The author is Mr. Walter Savage Cooper, and the incidental music is written by Miss Edith Ellsworth and Mr. F. A. W. Docker. The plot of the play brings in Queen Elizabeth (whose part was played by Miss Sydney Keith with appropriate dignity and admirable elocution), and it provides excuses for many dances and songs and revels. The music if it steered clear of originality certainly displayed considerable taste, and with the exception of an occasional dash of modernity maintained a pleasing Old English flavour. A song sung by Miss Patricia Plowman was one of the most effective items, and a Pavan admirably danced by the Queen and a courtier was a good specimen of this stately and attractive musical form. The costumes showed elaborate care and provided a brilliant spectacle. A small orchestra played the accompaniments and dance music.

The eighty-third Anniversary Festival of the Printers' Pension, Almshouse and Orphan Asylum Corporation will take place at the Connaught Rooms on May 25, under the presidency of Sir G. Wyatt Truscott. The usefulness of this institution is shown by the fact that at the present time the sum of £7,300 is dispensed among 501 recipients—pensioners, inmates of the almshouses and orphans—but funds are still urgently needed, as there are over one hundred candidates awaiting election, and it is to be hoped that those who sympathize with the objects of this excellent institution will give their practical support on this occasion.

Dr. W. H. Cummings read an interesting paper on 'Dr. Arne' at the Musical Association meeting held at Messrs. Broadwood's rooms on March 15. The series of illustrations given included the following: Sonata, strings and pianoforte; recitative and air, 'Guardian angels'; Sonata, pianoforte; air, 'Gentle swain,' with violoncello obbligato. These were provided by Miss Doris Cloud and Miss Margery Holden (violin), Mr. Norman Attwell (violinello), Mr. Norman Cummings (pianoforte), and Miss Enid Cummings (vocalist). Some autograph letters and music and several portraits were also exhibited.

The St. Barnabas Orchestral Society gave a concert of Irish Music in the Hall of the Northern Polytechnic Institute on March 19. A varied selection of representative music received a very capable performance by the orchestra of fifty players, conducted by Mr. F. W. Platt, while Irish songs and duets were sung by Miss Grace Clare, Miss Ada Winfield, Miss Lilian Bradsell and Mr. Harry Kerlogue. During the evening a writing desk was presented to the hon. conductor by the members of the orchestra, as a mark of appreciation and esteem.

Mr. John Hedley, secretary of the Royal Choral Society, has been admitted by His Majesty the King a member of the Royal Victorian Order. At the conclusion of the choir rehearsal on March 21, a testimonial consisting of an address and a cheque for £171 was presented to Mr. Hedley by Sir Frederick Bridge, on behalf of the members of the Society, the committee, orchestra, old members, and personal friends.

Professor Leopold Auer, the distinguished violinist, has just been created a Commander of the Cross of the Order of Holy Vladimir. This is an Order which is very seldom conferred, and up to the present only two musicians have ever had the honour paid them, viz., the well-known Russian conductors, Naprawnik and Safonoff.

Mr. Emil Mlynarski has for some time past been composing a Symphony, which is almost completed. It is probable that there will be an opportunity of hearing this work performed in London at no distant date.

Dr. R. H. Wilson, well known as the chorus-master of the Hallé Concerts and of the Birmingham festival chorus, has been appointed conductor of the Macclesfield Choral Society.

The Manchester Orpheus Choir (male voices) under Mr. W. S. Nesbitt, is to visit Germany during Whitsuntide this year.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BARROW.—Elgar's 'King Olaf' was performed by the Choral Society at the Old Town Hall on March 3, under the conductorship of Dr. Brown. The choir sang with admirable spirit and effect, and gave ample evidence of their careful training by the conductor, while the orchestra, led by Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, rendered most efficient service. The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Langdon, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Norman Allen. Schumann's 'Träumerei' and Elgar's 'Imperial' march were included in the programme.

BATHGATE.—Performances of Gounod's 'Faust,' Cliffe's 'Ode to the north-east wind' and Stanford's 'Songs of the sea' were given by the combined Choral Unions of Bathgate and Armadale, at the former place on March 7, and at the latter on March 16. The soloists at Bathgate were Miss Ada Forrest and Messrs. Alfred Heather and Robert Burnett; at Armadale, Miss Rana Taggart and Messrs. Walter Lawley and Bridge Peters. Great credit is due to Mr. Hugh Somerville, who conducted, for the excellent manner in which the various works were performed.

BEDMINSTER.—The St. Luke's Choral Society gave their first annual concert, in St. Luke's schoolroom, on March 3, when a cantata entitled 'The wreck of the Argo,' by W. H. Birch, was performed, under the conductorship of Mr. C. H. Bishop. The solo parts were undertaken by Mrs. C. H. Bishop, Mrs. W. Redston, Mr. F. W. Alcock, Mr. E. Haines and Mr. C. H. Treleven. Miss A. F. J. Owner and Mr. G. S. Rudge played the accompaniments.

BIRKENHEAD.—On Thursday, February 24, in the Town Hall, the Birkenhead Glee and Madrigal Society (male voices) gave their annual concert to a crowded audience. The excellent singing of the choir under their new conductor, Mr. J. C. Clarke, was a special feature of the concert, and no fewer than three of their six items were encored. These were Hegar's 'Phantom host,' Walmisley's 'Music all-powerful' and Lee-Williams's 'Encouragement to a lover.' Miss Dora Heywood, Miss Marie Raynor, Mr. Roland Jackson, Mr. George Baker and Mr. John Lawson assisted.

BLACKBURN.—A concert was given by the Blackburn Ladies' Choir in the Town Hall, on March 3, in aid of the Workshops for the Blind, when the first part of the programme very appropriately consisted of selections from the compositions of Mr. W. Wolstenholme. These included 'The ballad of Sir Humphrey Gilbert,' and the part-songs 'The three fishers,' 'Sorrow of Werther' and 'A tragic story' (first performance). Pianoforte, violin and vocal solos were also contributed by the composer, Miss Isabel McCullagh (who replaced Miss Ivy Angove) and Mr. Frank Slater. The second part included the part-songs 'Dartside,' by Mr. Alfred Hollins, 'Under the greenwood tree' (Granville Bantock), 'At parting' (MacDowell), and 'Love song' (Brahms). The part-music was sung with fine expression by the choir, under the direction of Mr. Frank Duckworth.

BRIGHTON.—The third subscription concert of the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society took place in the Dome on March 10, when a highly successful performance of Gounod's 'Gallia' and Dr. Walford Davies's 'Everyman' was given. The choral numbers of both works were very ably rendered, the singing of the choir displaying very fine tone, expression, and power, while the orchestra was thoroughly efficient. The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Lund, Miss Ethel Dyer, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Julien Henry. Mr. Robert Taylor, who, it may be remarked, completed his fortieth year as conductor of the Society with a performance of the 'Messiah' on Good Friday, may be congratulated on that fact and on the excellence of both performances. A handsome silver tea-set and an illuminated address were recently presented to Mr. Taylor in commemoration of the event.

CALGARY (CANADA).—The Apollo Choir of Calgary, gave a programme of unaccompanied part-songs in St. Mary's Hall on January 27. The numbers included 'Lullaby of life' (Leslie), 'When love and beauty' (five parts) (Sullivan), 'The caravan' (Pinsuti), 'My love dwelt in a Northern land' and 'O happy eyes' (Elgar) 'Summer is y' coming in' (six-part madrigal) and 'Legend' (Tchaikovsky). Mr. Percy L. Newcombe conducted.

CARDIFF.—Two concerts were given by the Roath Park Presbyterian and Conway Road Wesleyan Church Choirs, at their respective churches, on March 2 and 9, when the programme included Haydn's 'Spring,' Cowen's 'He giveth His beloved sleep,' Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' and a quartet, 'The Lord is gracious,' by the conductor, Mr. W. A. Richards. Under his direction the united choirs sang well, and the solo vocalists were Madame Ethel Fairburn, Miss Lottie Wakelin, Mr. C. David and Mr. John Owen. Mr. Norman Kendrick accompanied ably on the organ.

CHELTONHAM.—The Cheltenham Musical Festival Society held a conversazione in Bennington Hall on March 1 (St. David's Day), when the veteran conductor, Mr. J. A. Matthews, gave a chat about music, chiefly Welsh, and a varied and interesting programme was presented by members of the Society. The Society and their conductor celebrated their fortieth anniversary on this occasion.

CLYDACH.—An excellent performance of Handel's 'Judas Maccabeus' was given on March 10 by the Hebron Chapel choir, assisted by Miss Alice Cave, Miss Rachel Jones, Mr. Harry Lewis and Mr. David Hughes, and an orchestra, led by Mr. Walter Whitaker. Mr. Edwin Davies conducted, and Mr. G. Grove was the organist.

COALVILLE.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's wedding-feast' in the Adult School Hall on February 23. The principal vocalists were Miss Lucie Rosenberg, Miss Lager, Mr. W. Brown and Mr. A. V. Cresser. There was a small but efficient string band led by Mr. B. H. Burrows, with Miss Martin at the pianoforte. Mr. Frank Storer conducted.

CROYDON.—A highly interesting and successful concert was given by Miss Constance Baxendale in the small Public Hall on March 3. The concert-giver is a contralto vocalist of excellent abilities, and among the notable features of a well-rendered programme were her admirable interpretation of 'Che farò' (Gluck) and 'On an air of Rameau' (May Dawson), her sister's spirited recitation of 'Shamus O'Brien' (Le Fanu), Miss Dawson's sympathetic treatment of a group of pieces by 17th century composers, and a capital performance of César Franck's fine Sonata in A, for pianoforte and violin, by Miss Dawson and Mr. W. H. Reed.

DUNDEE.—The Amateur Choral Union gave a very successful performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' and Stanford's 'Revenge' on March 9. The soloists were Miss Jenny Taggart, Mr. Henry Brearley and Mr. Robert Radford. A professional orchestra of forty-three performers, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole, of Glasgow, ably supplied the accompaniments. Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducted.

EDENBRIDGE.—Haydn's 'Creation' was performed by the Choral Society on March 16, under the direction of Mr. W. E. Weaver. The choir and orchestra, led by Mr. J. Weaver, numbered eighty performers, and the solo vocalists were Madame Le Mar, Mr. F. Norcup, and Mr. George Stubbs.

FOLKESTONE.—Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was given for the first time here by the Philharmonic Society, on March 16. The solo parts were efficiently sung by Miss Winifred Marwood, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. William Maxwell and Mr. Montague Borwell. The choir and orchestra of 170 did efficient work, special attention being paid to the delicate nuances which abound. The 'Stabat Mater' was followed by a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.' Mr. F. E. Fletcher was the conductor.

GREAT YARMOUTH.—The first concert by the united Nonconformist choirs took place in the Town Hall on March 3, when Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was performed under the direction of Mr. W. M. Chapman. The amalgamated choirs numbered 150, and their singing displayed good attack and excellent tone and expression. Efficient aid was given by the orchestra led by Mr. C. B. Diver, and the solo vocalists were Miss Helen Strange, Miss Nellie Cockrill, Mr. H. J. Sawford Dye and Mr. F. C. Grice.

GUERNSEY.—The two concerts usually given by the Guille-Allé's Choral and Orchestral Associations took place on March 8 and 9, under the conductorship of Mr. John David. On the first evening Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was performed in its English version 'At the foot of the Cross.' This was its first performance in the island, and the work made many warm friends among the performers and audience. On the next evening Elgar's 'King Olaf,' which had been performed some seasons before, was heard again with the greatest delight by a large audience. The soloists, all of whom were well received, were Miss Jennie Ellis, Miss Joan Ashley, Mr. William Maxwell and Mr. John Prout. Mrs. Noel and Mrs. Gardner were very able accompanists.

HERSHAM.—The Choral Society gave a performance of Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' on February 24 in the Public Hall. The solo vocalists were Miss Hilda Morris, Mrs. Adams, Mr. Hugh Williams, and Mr. C. H. Fisher. Mr. H. T. Gilberthorpe and Mr. Cecil Fenn presided respectively at the organ and pianoforte, and Mr. Carey Bliss conducted. The second part included part-songs by the choir, and a violin solo by Miss Hildgrave Mason.

KIRKOWAN.—The annual concert of the Musical Society took place at St. Cunan's Hall on Friday, March 11, when Cunningham Woods's cantata 'King Harold' was satisfactorily performed by the choir and small orchestra, conducted by Mr. John Crozier. The solo vocalists were Miss Jeanie B. Scott, Mr. Alexander McCredie and Mr. Andrew Sharp.

LANCASTER.—The choir conducted by Mr. J. W. Aldous gave their third 'open night' in the Ashton Hall on March 9. The choir displayed the excellence of tone and expression which have won them honours at various competitions, notable successes in the programme being MacDowell's 'A summer wind,' 'The river floweth strong,' Roland Rogers, 'Tears, idle tears,' J. E. Adkins, and 'My true love hath my heart,' W. A. C. Cruickshank. Miss Lillie Wormald and Miss Lillian Brash (vocalists), and Mr. Leonard Watkins (violinist), assisted, and Mr. J. W. Aldous conducted with customary care and skill.

LEAMINGTON.—A successful concert of sacred music was given by the Madrigal Society at the Town Hall on March 3. The programme included the Passion music from the 'Messiah,' Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' and Gounod's 'Messe solennelle.' Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Carrie James, Mr. Alban Cohen and Mr. Sidney Stoddard were the solo vocalists, and Mr. E. Roberts-West conducted.

NORTHWICH.—A concert was given by the Philharmonic Society on March 15, at the Drill Hall. The choral numbers were Gounod's 'Gallia,' Hiller's 'Song of victory,' and Fanning's 'Liberty,' which were excellently performed by an efficient choir and band selected from the Hallé and Richter Orchestra. Miss Edina Thraves sang the solos. The programme also included the Andante and Saltarello from Mendelssohn's 'Italian Symphony.' Mr. Tom Shaw conducted.

OLDHAM.—The Musical Society gave a concert on March 2, when Elgar's 'King Olaf' and 'From the Bavarian Highlands' were heard for the first time here. The choir and orchestra, numbering 130 performers, gave a highly satisfactory rendering of these works, reflecting much credit on their conductor, Mr. H. Brookes, and the solo parts were efficiently sung by Madame Effie Thomas, Mr. Joseph Reed and Mr. Hamilton Harris.

SOUTHPORT.—The Southport Vocal Union (male choir), under the conductorship of Mr. J. C. Clarke, gave the third Bohemian concert of the season on Thursday, March 10, in the concert hall of the Queen's Hotel. The high standard of excellent singing by this well-known choir was well maintained in all their part-songs, which included 'When shadows flee' (Scharwenka), 'Bold Turpin' (Bridge) and 'King of worlds' (Dard-Janin).

TREALAW, TONYPANDY.—Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' were performed by the Ebenezer Choral Society, in the Judges' Hall, on February 24. The solo parts were sung by Miss Bessie Jones, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. David Hughes, and the choir, numbering 80 voices, sang with much intelligence, under the conductorship of Mr. W. T. David. A capable orchestra led by Mr. W. T. Hudy assisted.

UCKFIELD.—The Uckfield and District Musical Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Leonini's 'Gate of Life' on February 23. The choruses were admirably sung by a choir of ninety voices, and an orchestra of thirty, led by Mr. W. A. Baker, with Mr. W. J. Evans at the organ, gave efficient aid. The solos were sung by Miss Mabel Manson, Messrs. David Ellis and Dan Price, Miss Nina Lucas joining Miss Manson in the duet 'I waited for the Lord.' Mr. Henry Radcliffe Revelly was the conductor.

WINDSOR.—An interesting lecture on Debussy was given by Mr. T. F. Dunhill at the Royal Albert Institute on March 1. Dr. C. H. Lloyd was in the chair. Vocal and instrumental illustrations were contributed by Miss Gladys Honey, the Rev. Bernard Everett, Mr. Colin Taylor and the lecturer.

WORTHING.—The annual concert of the Choral Society was held on March 2 at St. James's Hall, when Haydn's 'Creation,' Parts I. and II., was successfully performed, followed by a miscellaneous second part. The principal vocalists were Madame Louise Parker, Mr. Albert Watson and Mr. Robert Charlesworth. The choir sang with great expression and good attack. There was a small orchestra, supplemented by organ (Mr. Guy Mitchell) and pianoforte (Miss Bilbe). Mr. F. D. Carnell conducted.

WINCHESTER.—Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' was performed by the Choral Society in the Guildhall on March 10, with considerable success. The choir did excellent work, notably in the 'Plague choruses,' indicating the careful training they had received at the hands of their conductor, Mr. C. H. Gamblin. The solos were undertaken by Miss Estella Linden, Miss Amy Tyndale and Mr. W. H. Cross, the duet 'The Lord is a Man of war' being well-sung by the basses of the choir. The orchestra, led by Miss Maria Taylor, with Mr. E. W. Savage at the organ, was thoroughly capable.

WORCESTER.—The Musical Society performed Haydn's 'Creation' on March 8. Madame Laura Taylor, Mr. H. Large and Mr. Graham Smart were the principal vocalists, and the chorus did excellent work throughout the oratorio. A full orchestra, with Mr. W. Henry Dyson as principal violin, was most efficient in the accompaniments. Mr. W. Mann Dyson conducted, and is to be congratulated on a very successful performance.

Answers to Correspondents.

J. P. H.—'The School-music Teacher' (Curwen) explains the Tonic Sol-fa method and its application to the staff from a teacher's point of view. Dr. Hulbert 'On Breathing' (Novello), and Mr. Bates's book, 'Voice culture for children' (Novello), are complete guides on voice-production in schools. You should also see the School Music Review each month. A good pianoforte book for beginners is 'First steps to the pianoforte,' by Francesco Berger, in Novello's Primer Series.

ANXIOUS.—Vocal scores of 'Rienzi' (Wagner) and 'Mignon' (A. Thomas) can be obtained through Novello & Co. at 7s. 6d. and 15s. respectively. Grove's notes on Brahms's first Symphony have been published in the Musical Times (May and June, 1905). His notes on the other Symphonies have not yet appeared.

H. M. L. wishes to know the name and composer of an old song, of which the first words are:

'Joyful news has come to-day,
Baby mine,
From a land far, far away,
Baby mine.'

STUDENT.—We cannot mention specially any Italian teacher of singing, or institution. The statements made on pp. 238-9 of our present issue suggest caution. You would probably get more benefit from a course at one of the London Institutions or from well-known teachers.

'CHALUMBAU.'—This word as applied to the clarinet refers to the low register of the instrument. Passages to be played in this register are often written an octave higher than they sound, and the return to the normal octave is indicated by the word clarino or loco.

NEUME and K. H.—We do not know of any special agency that would find you a post as music-master in a school. The ordinary scholastic agencies usually know all there is to know about vacancies.

PIANIST.—The four-hand (one pianoforte) duets you name are published by various firms abroad, but they are all stocked by Novello & Co.

N. O. L.—Your first letter must have miscarried. Pronounce 'a' as in 'father' and 'o' as in 'home.'

W. D. T.—Much information as to Ely Cathedral was given in the Musical Times for March, 1902.

Owing to the necessity of our going to press before Easter, we are compelled to hold over much interesting matter that reached us too late, and many Answers to Correspondents.

NEW ANTHEMS, &c.

COMPOSED BY CALEB SIMPER.

FOR ANNIVERSARIES AND WHITSUNTIDE.

The Composer, "Kilbirnie," Barnstaple, invites Choirmasters to send to him for FREE SPECIMENS of either three Anthems.

*THE LORD LOVETH THE GATES OF ZION Just issued 4d.
A new and brilliant Anthem, charmingly effective, and full of interesting passages. Very attractive Soprano or Tenor Solo, a fine and expressive Bass Solo with powerful, telling, spirited, and sonorous Choruses.

*PRAISE HIS HOLY NAME Just issued 3d.

Opens with a stirring Chorus, most effectively varied. The middle portion contains a sweet Soprano Solo, repeated as a soft Chorus. The "Finale" is another irresistible movement which works up grandly. This Anthem is scored for a Small Orchestra in an effective style. Parts for Strings, Fl., Cl., Cor., and Bass Tromb., may be had.

*SHOUT FOR JOY. New last year 16th 1000 4d.

*BLESSED BE MY ROCK 14th 1000 4d.
Orchestral Parts issued.

*TELL IT OUT 13th 1000 3d.

The above three Anthems were all sung at Choral Festivals last year with great success.

SET TO MUSIC BY

JOHN MERBECKE

(A.D. 1550).

EDITED, WITH AN ACCOMPANIMENT FOR ORGAN

BY

BASIL HARWOOD.

This edition of Merbecke's Communion Service is based on Rimbault's reprint of 1871, after a careful comparison with a copy of the original edition of 1550 belonging to the Library of Christ Church, Oxford. The Plain Song is presented as nearly as possible in the form in which it first appeared, only such changes having been introduced as are required by the altered wording of our Prayer Book.

* CHURCH TIMES.—"I received from a composer, quite unknown to me (John Pulein by name), a very pleasing Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, published by Messrs. Stainer & Bell. This, a simple, quiet setting, in its modulation and some of its cadences, quite reflects the music of Gibbons and that era of Church music, but it is not in the least degree pedantic, and possesses a modern independence of thought. Moreover, it has not a single repetition in the words. . . . Another virtue I was glad to notice in Mr. Pulein's Magnificat was his simple treatment of the words 'and holy is His Name.'"

COMPOSER'S MS.

EXTRACTS FROM PREFACE.

My guiding principle has been to place before the reader the facts collected by me as well as the conclusions at which I arrived. This will enable him to see the subject in all its bearings, with all its pros and cons, and to draw his own conclusions, should mine not obtain his approval.

My researches had for their object the whole life of Chopin and his historical, political, artistical, social, and personal surroundings, but they were chiefly directed to the least known and most interesting period of his career—his life in France, and his visits to Germany and Great Britain.

ENDYMION'S DREAM

CANTATA

FOR SOPRANO AND TENOR SOLI, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS BY

C. R. B. BARRETT

THE MUSIC BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A short cantata, this, which occupies little more than half-an-hour in performance, it is likely to become popular on account of the pleasant nature of its music, even though a good deal more use might be, and perhaps should have been, made of the chorus. But not since, in his student days, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor evolved the opening part of his "Hiawatha" trilogy, has he composed music that seemed so grateful and so inevitable. . . . There are in the score many pages in which the composer's own individuality appears unmistakably, and his is a decidedly interesting individuality. This, combined with the picturesqueness of the music, the dramatic nature of the "book," and the comparative freedom of the score from ultra-modern difficulties, should enable the cantata to find many a hearing, more especially in choirs and places where the pitch is not so high as in use at Brighton.

MORNING POST.

His music shows no decrease in choral effect, and this remains the composer's strong point and the outstanding feature of the work. . . . Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is to be commended for his appreciation of the design best suited to the theme of the union of Sun and Moon. His eloquence of musical utterance, his command of orchestral colour, and his grasp of fundamental principles of choral writing are present throughout.

STANDARD.

Seldom has so much urgent music—music that breathes and reeks of romance and passion in almost every bar—been compressed into so small a compass. At a time when the future of English opera is upon every one's lips it is encouraging to meet with a work that reveals a sense of the theatre so unmistakably as does Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's so-called cantata. The composer employs the representative theme, but he employs it with discretion, and the orchestral writing throughout is both free and unfettered. Notwithstanding that the passion is nothing if not cumulative, the skill with which he avoids an anti-climax is remarkable. A delightfully atmospheric chorus of stars—constellations—founded on a descending chromatic figure, leads to Selene's solo, which contains some of the most beautiful music in the work; indeed, throughout the vocal writing is of an unusually grateful nature. Moreover, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's stock of orchestral device and colour is unflagging.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Words which Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has wedded to appropriate and delightful music. . . . The work will undoubtedly add to Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's laurels.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The new cantata will not improbably rank high among the composer's works, for it seems to mark a distinct advance in his musical individuality. . . . The themes are in themselves striking and dramatically expressive. . . . He is more terse, more concentrated, and just as picturesque as ever, and he reveals almost unsuspected dramatic power.

OBSERVER.

It is the most vital work he has written for a long time. He has not since his early days so well resisted the temptation to set down superfluous things just because they come easily to him, and this is only another way of saying that it is conciser and better balanced than anything he has composed for a long time. It also shows a finer sense of climax and of dramatic music as distinct from that which is merely superficially picturesque.

ATHENÆUM.

Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's "Endymion's Dream," a cantata of modest proportions, but one of which the freshness and rhythmic life, and the dramatic and poetical character of the music, recall the composer's "Hiawatha."

WORLD.

Coleridge-Taylor's "Dream of Endymion" is likely to rank as his best work since "Hiawatha," for it is stronger and terser, and gives proof of greater intellectuality without loss of the qualities of sensuous charm which always distinguishes Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, even when he is least his best self.

"By the production of these Trios our townsman, Mr. A. R. Gaul, has made a valuable addition to the many beautiful and useful compositions he has formerly given to the public. Mr. Gaul's music is unfailingly charming, the voice-parts being so disposed that they may be easily learnt, and the accompaniments are as characteristic as they are pretty. Each separate piece is so good that we cannot make references to special favourites. Young ladies who take pleasure in part-singing will find variety in the collection, and both in the home-circle and in the school class Mr. Gaul's new work is sure to be heartily welcomed."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Mr. James Dear's 'Songs of the Open Air' are robust, healthy, and vigorous . . . of sound spirit."—Daily Telegraph.

"The programme contained another of the novelties of the Festival in the shape of a cycle of songs for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, entitled 'Songs of the Open Air,' by Mr. James R. Dear, who conducted the performance, with Mr. Plunket Greene as soloist. The spirit of the setting pleased the audience, who recalled composer and soloist many times."—Morning Post.

"Mr. J. R. Dear's fine 'Songs of the Open Air' met with a deservedly warm reception."—Standard.

"Mr. Plunket Greene was also a capital exponent of a picturesque cycle, 'Songs of the Open Air,' set for baritone, chorus, and orchestra, by Mr. James R. Dear. These songs, which cover a variety of moods with originality and real imagination, were enthusiastically received."—Daily News.

"The only new work on Friday night was a freshly vigorous set of 'Songs of the Open Air,' for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, by Mr. James R. Dear. They are melodious, and have a pleasing lilt and are very British."—Globe.

"Five 'Songs of the Open Air,' by Mr. James R. Dear (sung by Mr. Plunket Greene) . . . all have distinct charm and character."—The Times.

"The songs are five in number, and are remarkable for manly sentiment, alternately vigorous and thoughtful. The composer most cleverly suggests the mystical atmosphere and spirit of the lines, and I warmly recommend these songs to baritones in particular, and choral societies in general."—Referee.

"Songs of the Open Air,' which are set for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, are likely to be very popular for many reasons. They are full of life, the vocal part is grateful, and there is something peculiarly British about them, and the very cordial reception of the songs was well justified."—Sunday Times.

"Songs of the Open Air,' by Mr. James R. Dear, should be heard often. They are fresh and melodious, and very British, without being too beefy. They will be effective anywhere if sung by a baritone who has life and a gift of humour in his singing."—World.

"Songs of the Open Air.' They proved immensely popular with the audience, and deservedly so, for they fully justify their title, and have a tremendous deal of vitality."—Morning Leader.

TECHNIQUE

AND

IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

120 FIGURED-BASSES

ESPECIALLY DESIGNED FOR THE USE OF CANDIDATES PREPARING FOR THE DIPLOMAS OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

ARRANGED IN FIVE GRADES

BY

JOSEPH R. TOBIN,

Mus. Bac. Dunelm.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

Whilst primarily intended for the use of candidates preparing for the diplomas of the Royal College of Organists, these Bases may also prove useful to harmony students in general. A blank stave has been provided with each exercise; this not only eases the eye, and so facilitates the reading of the bases, but it also enables the student to work the exercises away from the keyboard.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

The Competition Festival Record

No. 21.

STRATFORD (ESSEX).

March 5, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12.

HERE and there it is found that competition festivals droop because they lack the charm of novelty. At Stratford it seems that custom does not stale the interest, for even in its twenty-eighth year, the entries, although not quite up to last year's record, were the second best in the history of the festival. Another gratifying feature of this year's festival was the remarkably good attendance of the public, who, if they come even for mere curiosity, cannot fail to be educated.

The pianoforte classes were so numerous at this festival, that we are unable to do more than record the chief results in the senior sections. These were as follows:

GOLD MEDALS.

Miss Rosa Bonner (Upton Manor).
Nineteen years of age and over, Miss Ruby Wastell (South Woodford).

Seventeen to eighteen, Miss Kathleen Murphy (Leytonstone).
Miss Murphy also gained the prize for accompanying at sight.

SOLO-SINGING—GOLD MEDALS.

Tenor.—Mr. Holden Heywood.
Baritone.—Mr. Arthur Earle.
Bass.—Mr. F. C. Saunders Squire.

In the other solo-singing classes there were two separate sections for each voice. One was for lyric songs and the other for descriptive songs. The winners of first places were as follows:

Soprano.—Miss Hilda Gildersleve and Miss Helena Ellis.
Mezzo.—Miss Eveline Matthews.
Contralto.—Miss Edith Williams and Miss Catherine Puttick.
Tenor.—Mr. Herbert Wild.
Baritone.—Mr. Frank H. Green and Mr. Horace R. Nudds.
Bass.—Mr. Edward T. Dowty.

The tenors and basses were not tempted by a descriptive song, yet there are many lurid and harrowing specimens of this style for these voices.

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS (Bands of Hope, &c.).

Test for all Choirs: "Gentle words and loving hearts" (T. Facer).
Grove Mission (Mr. Frank E. Creed).
"Comrades' song of hope" (A. Adam).
Hale End Free Church Band of Hope (Mr. G. Lake).
"Song to the morn" (R. Bernard Elliott).
1st. Plashet Park Congregational Band of Hope (Miss H. M. Haslam).
"Sing, O bird" (Owen).

SOUTH LONDON.

February 26, 28; March 2, 3, 5.

The festival was very well accommodated in the large hall of the Battersea Polytechnic. The audiences were not often large. The neighbourhood is a difficult one to stir. But the friends of the numerous competitors were appreciative listeners.

Last year fault was found in the Press with the character of some of the tests. The committee was sensible enough not to resent this criticism, but rather to obey it. Very little fault could be found with the music selected for this occasion; much of it was first-rate, and well adapted to the various capacities of competitors. In the chief choral classes the singing reached a high standard. Even in the North of which we hear so much, it is rare to hear such splendid choral performance as was given by the Maidstone Choir, under the very able direction of Mr. F. Wilson Parrish. Fine tone, high technical finish, and thoughtful interpretation were its outstanding features. In this connection it may be well for the managers to consider the expediency of asking choirs in this section at least to sing the same tests, and not one of their own choice.

The chief results of the competitions were as follows:—

PIANOFORTE SOLOS (5 classes).

- (Ages 8 and 9).—Doris Duck.
(Ages 10 and 11).—Dorothy Shoreman.
(Age 12).—Irene G. Evans.

The secretary, Mr. T. Lester Jones and his helpful wife, were as usual able managers of the proceedings. Dr. Abernethy was the official accompanist.

SHEFFIELD.

March 10.

The Sunday School Union Competitions, held at Montgomery Hall, comprised contests in musical drill, elocution, singing and pianoforte. John Street P.M. (Miss Clayton) were victorious over Grimesthorpe U.M.C. (Mr. W. C. Watling) in the first-named class, which was judged by Miss S. Quayle. In the remaining classes, Mr. J. A. Rodgers adjudicated. The prize-winners were Miss Jessie Fletcher (senior soprano), Miss Ponsford (junior soprano), Miss Marion Scott (contralto), and Douglas Dawn (pianoforte, under 11).

MANCHESTER TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

March 12.

For the third successive year the Manchester District Board of the Tonic Sol-fa College held its annual festival in the Royal Technical Institute, Peel Park. The programme was again expanded, and comprised the following competitive classes: Senior and junior girls' solo, senior and junior boys' solo, duet, violin, choral and ear-test competitions. The chief event of the day was the contest between the following nine choirs for the Alderman Kevney challenge shield:

- Alfred Street C.S. (Boys), Harpurhey (Mr. J. B. Jubb).
Longsight Juvenile Choir (Miss B. Fletcher).
St. Mark's Mixed School, Gorton (Mr. F. W. Ball).
Tootal Road C.S. (Mr. W. H. Ainley).
Grecian Street School, Salford (Mr. G. S. Smith).
Alfred Street C.S. (Girls), Harpurhey (Miss B. Wolstencroft).
Halton Bank C.S., Pendleton (Mr. John J. Ireland).
Seedley C.S., Pendleton (Mr. J. W. Stacey).
Eccles Co-operative Juvenile Choir (Mr. James Currie).

Each choir sang Dr. Roland Rogers's two-part song, "Gentle swallow," and a two-part eight-test. This test was by no means an easy one, including as it did chromatic tones, half-pulse notes, syncopation, awkward intervals, and independent entry of parts. On the whole it was fairly well sung by all the choirs, the sight-reading showing a decided advance on that of former years. The judge awarded the challenge shield to Eccles (the holders) with 92 marks, the second prize to Grecian Street with 90, and the third to Alfred Street Girls with 84 marks.

The following were the test-pieces and first-prize winners in the other classes:

- Senior Girls' Solo, "At night" (Randegger).—Ethel Hands (Eccles Co-operative).
Junior Girls' Solo, "Slumber song" (Mendelssohn).—Engle Wilson (Tootal Road).
Senior Boys' Solo, "Nymphs and Shepherds" (Purcell).—Harry Darbyshire (Grecian Street).
Junior Boys' Solo, "May-dew" (W. S. Bennett).—Ambrose Kenyon (Harpurhey).
Duets (open to Boys and Girls), "Song of the dunes" (C. H. Lloyd).
—Gladys Leigh and Hilda Harding (Longsight Juvenile Choir).
Violin Solo (open to Boys and Girls), "Hey-o-hey" (A. Richards).
—W. H. Harrison (Swinton).
Individual Ear-test Competition (38 entries).—Connie Saunders (Tootal Road).

The evening's programme included the singing of selected pieces and the sight-test by the three winning choirs, interspersed with solos by the first-prize winners of the day, and followed by a short but practical demonstration of the Method. The practical value of the method in ear-training was demonstrated by means of a double-chant written by Mr. Cowley. This was played on the pianoforte to the children, who took it down note for note, and then sang in two-part harmony. The Mayoress of Salford distributed the prizes.

ISLE OF MAN.

March 15, 16, 17.

The nineteenth annual competition festival organized by the Isle of Man Fine Arts and Industrial Guild, was again a success, a result largely due to the organizing ability of Mrs. Laughton. The adjudicators were Mr. George Rathbone, Mr. John W. Ivimey and Mr. Frank Radcliffe. The chief solo prize-winners were:

- Pianoforte (senior).—Miss Nellie Holmes. sight-reading.—Mr. J. K. Looney.
Violin (under 17).—Cecil A. A. Corlett.
(senior).—Mr. A. Ande son.
Organ Solo (senior).—Mr. Edwin A. Clegg.

In the following adult solo-singing competitions, special contests were arranged for 1st and 2nd prize-winners of previous years:

- Soprano.—Miss E. Price.
(special).—Miss Mary Clague.
Contralto.—Miss A. Mylchreest.
Mezzo-Soprano.—Miss D. Morton.
(special).—Miss A. A. Cannell.
Tenor.—Mr. Horace Gray.
(special).—Mr. Arthur Dick.
Baritone.—Mr. A. Bing.
(special).—Mr. George Lewin.
Bass.—Mr. W. H. Quayle.
(special).—Mr. Thomas Waterson.

ANTONIO STRADIVARI

HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice." The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

PIANISTS AND PRACTICE.

"PRACTICE MAKES PERFECT," WHEN

PRACTICE IS PERFECT.

It is not perfect unless laws of Nature are understood and obeyed. When a saw is blunt you sharpen it, but not by sawing. Neither can the ordinary pianist perfect his hands and arms by keyboard work. The only sound way to do so is by the special method discovered by Mr. Macdonald Smith. This is true physiological "practice" which "makes perfect," and soon leads to the disappearance of every technical difficulty. The splendid results of the well-known System "From Brain to Keyboard" are described by pupils in "Light on Pianoforte Playing," which may be had free by post on application.

PLAYING MUSIC AT SIGHT AS EASILY AS READING A BOOK.

To play music at sight should, to all pianists, be as easy as reading a book. By ordinary methods, the ability to do so is only acquired as the result of years of practising for many hours daily. My System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing will enable a pianist to attain much greater proficiency in three months of about a quarter-of-an-hour's daily practice.

The System is founded upon hitherto neglected scientific principles, and aims at the establishment of an instantaneous and automatic connection between the musical symbols and the muscular actions which represent them.

Hundreds of students have taken my Course of Correspondence Lessons with remarkable success. A full explanation of the System, together with opinions of pupils, is given in my Booklet, sent free on application.

THE MALKIN PATENT PEDAL ATTACHMENT

All Organists should write for particulars of above attachment. It is the latest invention, most up-to-date, the simplest, best and cheapest attachment on the market, absolutely noiseless, is easily fixed by any amateur, and will not injure the most delicate pianoforte.

OUR NEW AND EXCLUSIVE OCTAVE ATTACHMENT is the Greatest Advance in Pedal Attachments since their introduction.

The following testimonial is one of many—

DEAR SIR, Brampton, Cumberland.

After an exhaustive examination and trial of your attachment, I am well satisfied that it is the best on the market for simplicity and durability, noiseless and perfect repetition, and non-injurious to any piano. It cannot be beaten, and the moderate price should guarantee a large sale.

Yours faithfully,
F. DIGGLE, Mus. Bac., A.R.C.O.

MR. JOHN BOOTH

(TENOR VOCALIST)

Pupil of Mr. JOHN ACTON, and late Royal Manchester College of Music.

SOCIETA ARMONICA, LIVERPOOL, Jan. 29, 1910.

"The vocal element was entrusted to Mr. John Booth, a young tenor hailing from Bolton, and a pupil, I understand, of John Acton, of Manchester and London. Mr. Booth's voice is of the right timbre, and his method is easy and production unforced. Mozart's 'Il mio tesoro' demands 'legato' and 'bravura' qualities of a high order, and it is not too much to say they were both conspicuously present in Mr. Booth's rendering of that exquisite lyric. The 'canto' was firmly phrased and the 'roulades' scaled with rapidity and evenness. Weber's big scena, 'Thro' the forests' ('Der Freischütz') was another severe test from which the young man successfully emerged, and I cannot help thinking that, with a little more animation—which will no doubt come with experience—Mr. Booth will soon find his services much in request. There are so many baritones nowadays masquerading as tenors that, when the real article comes along as in this case, the fact cannot be too strongly emphasised. Both the Mozart and Weber numbers were well accompanied by the orchestra, which maintained a non-obtrusive but effective attitude."—"BOURDON," Musical Standard.

MR.

CHARLESWORTH GEORGE

(BASS-BARITONE).

MORNING POST.

Mr. Charlesworth George's singing was notable for his good articulation, but to this virtue he adds the natural gift of a baritone voice of considerable resonance and useful quality, and sufficient technical skill to leave him free to follow the dictates of his temperament. He showed a suitable appreciation of each item of the well-varied programme chosen for performance. His readings of airs from operas by Mozart, Massenet, and Verdi, and a number of short songs, placed his capacity for interpreting their meaning beyond doubt, and his phrasing of the air "Vision Fugitive" alone was sufficient to establish his claim to musicianship.

STANDARD.

Mr. Charlesworth George's voice is a bass-baritone of a fine resonant quality throughout, and he sings with a sincerity and dramatic insight that should serve him in good stead should he ever decide to turn his talents to the interpretation of opera in English. Both Henschel's "Young Dietrich" and the "Credo" from Verdi's "Otello" showed Mr. Charlesworth George to be a singer who has the capacity of expressing himself intelligently, forcibly, and convincingly.

COURT JOURNAL.

There is something more than the makings of a fine artist in Mr. Charlesworth George. His voice is not only of a grateful and equable quality throughout, but he sings with a dramatic intuition and nervous force that cannot fail to be of very material service in the future.

REFEREE.

Mr. Charlesworth George has a fine bass-voice of extensive compass. His readings testified to a keen perception, and clearness of articulation was a pleasing feature of his singing.

YORKSHIRE OBSERVER.

A musical event of some local interest was the successful London debut at the Æolian Hall of Mr. Charlesworth George, a Shipley vocalist, of whom more seems likely to be heard. He submitted a large choice of songs and arias by Mozart, Purcell, Schubert, Verdi, Massenet, Puccini, Tosti, Jensen, Lehmann, and his own master, Chilver-Wilson, and furnished an ample test of an exceptionally good voice of considerable range and fine ringing qualities. His appeal to his London audience was assured from the first, and not many aspirants to musical honours meet with as flattering and as promising a reception.

The following is a letter from Mr. H. Chilver-Wilson, who was the teacher of Mr. Herbert Brown:

Mayfield, Woodgrange Avenue, Ealing, W.

"I can with the utmost confidence recommend Mr. Charlesworth George as a bass-baritone vocalist. He has a really fine voice, with the exceptional compass from the low bass C to the high baritone G (two octaves and a fifth), even and powerful throughout."

"In addition he has decided temperament, and his future promises to be brilliant."

"He has studied with me long and earnestly, and is enthusiastic in his work."

(Signed) "H. CHILVER-WILSON"

(Associate of the Philharmonic Society of London)."

"ELIJAH" (Weybridge, April 26).—"The performance was specially noteworthy for the fine interpretation of the outstanding rôle by Mr. Robin Overleigh. This singer ranged up and down the entire gamut of the emotions. He was in turn supplicating, dramatic, derisive, passionate, declamatory, despairing, serene. His voice accommodated itself to every mood, and its fine timbre responded readily to each new demand."

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

MAY 1, 1910.

HENRY RICHARD BIRD.

The vagaries of solo singers in their relations with pianoforte accompanists are a byword. A distressful proportion of even trained vocalists, to say nothing of the other and greater class, show a fine contempt for the arbitrary and dictatorial slavery of rhythmic notation, and an irrepressible natural talent for rubato. How often the most skilful and alert accompanists are made to enjoy all the pleasures of the chase! But in the great summing up of delinquencies it will probably be found that as a rough and vicarious retribution, the competent singers have suffered even more acutely from the inefficiencies of accompanists. A vague legend seems to be current to the effect that anyone who can play at all, must of necessity be able to play mere accompaniments. The greater must include the less. Perhaps the popularity, in social circles, of the drawing room ballad, accounts in some measure for the idea. It is fair to note that any sort of musical noise, greatly assisted by a generous use of the pedal, provides the necessary atmosphere in these cases. But we do not go so far as to say that if copies are scarce the accompaniment of one song will do for another of this class, yet the experiment would be an interesting one, and might be tried, say, at a penny reading. Really the art of accompaniment on the pianoforte in its highest development, is a subtle one, and is probably unteachable to even skilful pianists who do not possess certain natural gifts. The ideal accompanist must be able to merge his individuality into that of the singer; he must journey side by side with his companion and not precede or follow (it is difficult to say which is more maddening); he must proportion all his dynamical effects to those designed by the singer, and he must follow the singer's idiosyncrasies of temperament, and his technical equipment must be practically faultless. Such complete sympathy and understanding can only be attained by rehearsal, however ready and able both performers may be.

These reflections are prompted by the fact that one of the most distinguished of English accompanists will be giving a jubilee concert at the Queen's Hall while these pages are being printed. It was a great gain and solace to many artists, both instrumental and vocal, that Mr. Henry R. Bird many years ago devoted his exceptional gifts to the art of accompanying. He did this at a time when good accompanists were rare. We recall Sidney Naylor and Ganz (happily still here with his flood of reminiscences). The circumstances under which Mr. Bird slid by a natural evolution into the position he adorns will, we are sure, be read with interest by a wide circle. We need therefore make no excuse for giving a sketch of his career.

Mr. Henry R. Bird was born at Walthamstow, Essex, in November, 1842. His father, Mr. George Bird, was organist of the Parish Church, Walthamstow, from 1829. He used often to speak of his friendship with Vincent Novello, who assisted him in the design of the fine organ of the church. He gave annual concerts, at one of which Clara Novello made an early appearance as a singer. Master Henry very soon developed his musical faculties and executive skill. Even when he was hardly eight years old he took part in his father's concerts, playing a pianoforte solo or accompanying the singers. A record of his precocity is found in a music book, wherein his mother has written that 'Harry played this voluntary at church on Sunday, October 28, 1849'; and later, in the same book, that 'H. R. Bird played the whole service for the first time on September 1, 1850, age seven years and nine months.'

In February, 1851, he was taken on trial as organist at St. John's Church, Walthamstow, and after three months he was duly appointed to the post at a salary of £20 a year. The service was a very simple, one and called for no special experience, but happily the post brought with it a generous friendship that was a potent influence on the young musician's career. Six months after the new appointment the Rev. S. M. Barkworth was installed as vicar of the church. He was a good practical musician, and soon began to interest himself in young Bird's education. He ordered a two-manual organ for the church, and provided the fees for Bird to have lessons from James Turle (then organist of Westminster Abbey), and gave him carte blanche to obtain all the music he wanted. Further, he had his young friend at the vicarage for months at a time, and frequently played pianoforte duets with him.

Mr. Bird's reminiscences of James Turle are instructive and interesting. Finding his pupil's touch very heavy ('a tower of the Abbey on each hand' and 'hands like legs of mutton,' he would say), he insisted upon pianoforte practice as a path to organ playing. Bird did not at the time relish being taken away from his favourite instrument (the organ), but later in life he realised the wisdom of his master's advice. He attended the services at the Abbey, and was soon trusted to take part of the organ duty. He also assisted at the services in the Chapel Royal, St. James's, where he met Arthur Sullivan, who was then a chorister, and this introduction began a friendship that lasted to the end of the composer's life. A fortuitous incident of this friendship turned out to be one of those tides in the affairs of men which taken at the flood lead on to fortune.

A musical society in connection with the Civil Service had been started about 1864, Sullivan conducting the orchestra and John Foster the choir. At one of the earliest of the concerts which were given in the old St. James's Hall, Beethoven's Pianoforte quartet was in the programme, but just before the hour for commencement, the pianist, Frederic Clay, hurt his hand so seriously that he could not play. Bird happened to be at the concert and was noticed by Sullivan, who asked him to the artists' room, and having ascertained that Bird knew the work induced him to undertake the pianoforte part without rehearsal. The readiness and capacity thus exhibited resulted in Bird being engaged as the permanent accompanist of the Society, a position he held until 1880. In addition to accompanying the many eminent artists engaged, he played concertos with the orchestra.

Bird remained organist of St. John's until November, 1858, and his next step in this branch of his now rapidly expanding professional work was to St. Mark's Church, Myddelton Square, Islington, a position he gained in a competition for which the late Dr. Hopkins was the umpire. In accordance with a custom now no longer current, this post brought with it much pianoforte teaching amongst the families of members of the congregation. In 1860 Bird again competed, this time for the organistship at St. Luke's, Chelsea, but George Carter was elected, and accordingly resigned his position at Holy Trinity, Chelsea, and the post there was offered to and accepted by Bird. As Mr. Carter stayed only a short time in the district there was a clear field for Bird to carry out a desire to found a large Choral and Orchestral Society. The organization was firmly established, and gave many important concerts at the Town Hall and sometimes in the Hanover Square Rooms. In this connection Bird met Weiss, the bass singer, and became his practice accompanist. Mr. Bird recalls that his own first London concert was given at Myddelton Hall, Islington, in 1860. At this début Mr. Henry Blagrove was one of the artists. It was at one of Mr. Bird's annual concerts that Mr. Plunket Greene made his first bow to a London audience. This was on May 16, 1888.

Through Mr. John Foster's influence, Bird was introduced as accompanist to some of the private musical societies which were much in vogue in the early sixties. One of these met alternately at the residence of Bishop Jackson at London House, and that of Mr. W. E. Gladstone at Carlton House Terrace. In 1866, Bird became organist of St. Gabriel's, Warwick Square, where there was the attraction of a full choral service, under the able direction of Mr. James Renwick. Then, in 1872, on the nomination of Turle, Bird was transferred to the new Parish Church, St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington. Here our bird of passage found something like a permanent home, for to this day he is caged at St. Mary's. At first the service there was very simple, and the choir consisted of ladies and gentlemen; but when, in 1875, Dr. MacLagan became vicar, a surplined choir was introduced for the two chief services. Now there are two full choirs, as four services are given every Sunday. The first choir of twenty-six boys and eighteen men, partly paid, officiates at 11.30 a.m. and 7 p.m., and the second choir of twenty-four boys and twelve men, all voluntary, comes at 9.30 a.m. and 4 p.m. There are two assistant-organists.

Bird, soon after his appointment, began a series of annual concerts at Kensington, at which classical programmes were performed. He had known Mr. Alfred Borwick (father of Leonard Borwick) for many years. Mr. Borwick was an enthusiastic musical amateur, and was able to introduce Bird to many important circles. One of these gatherings was held at the residence of Mr. Arthur Burnand, and it was here that Bird as a frequent accompanist of the soloists came under the notice of Arthur Chappell, who later engaged him as the regular accompanist of the Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts, which were then in great vogue in musical circles. This position was the culmination in Bird's career as an accompanist. He was here brought into intimacy with many of the leading artists of the world. A noteworthy addition to the important duties of this period was a close connection with Plunket Greene as his accompanist. Since the abandonment of the Chappell Concerts, Bird's services have been much in requisition.

There are now in the field many able accompanists. The demands of modern music have created an ample supply. But all Henry Bird's confrères will yield him the tribute of respect and regard as a master of the art. They may rival him in efficiency, but they will never excel him in modesty and winning unobtrusiveness.

The following quotation from a lecture Mr. Bird gave some years ago may serve to guide the aims of students :

The greater the artist the more easy was it to accompany him; the highest achievement was, he considered, for a singer not to feel conscious of the accompanist, and this could only be when each had the utmost confidence in the other. Sight-reading ought to be studied according to the rational principles of general reading, and he strongly advised students to try and realise the sound of what they read with their mental ear. As to a knowledge of harmony, a composition was made up of chords and figures, which figures were again scales and broken chords : a practised eye would discover the harmonic groundwork, and then the player was on safe ground. He warned students not to expect everything to be acquired with mechanical rapidity, but to remember that 'the executive musician must first attain to perfect command over his physical resources, such command involving not only dexterity of hand, but a certain degree of ease and assurance : he must be possessed by a real love and enthusiasm for his art, and for the best things in it, and he must cultivate the faculty of sympathy which probably lies hidden in every real artist, whatever his medium of expression.'

SIR HUBERT PARRY ON BACH.*

Among the unreasoned—perhaps unreasonable—suspicions that may trouble an Englishman from time to time is one that reluctantly credits Germany with a better appreciation of Shakespeare than we have ourselves. Sir Hubert Parry's book may strengthen the lurking and more flattering conviction that Bach is best understood by the English. Both ideas have some show of sense. Such a mountain as the Weisshorn looks heavenly from a great distance; and a great man, like a great peak, is ideally seen from far. Moreover it would seem that in sacred works, in deeply devotional expressions of all kinds, it is easier to discover our intimate personal longings in a language that is a little remote from our own. Latin, some one has said, is the language of prayer; and though this be counted an untenable and even foolish proposition, it is certain that remoteness is often a help to spiritual perception. Some such reason would seem at least partly to explain the unique hold Bach's music has upon musicians of every school to-day. His titanic language has the essential aloofness. Distance has lent not only enchantment to him, but discernment to us. Further, one quite special reason suggests itself why present-day England should lovingly study the gospel according to Bach. There seems justification for the hope that our very slowness may enable us to maintain, if but feebly, the old spirit of the Christian religion, as it was manifested in Bach, virtually unbroken until the tyranny of aggressive atheism be quite overpast, and until Bach's childlike devotion to Christ is clearly seen to be an enlightened man's normal condition, and no passing phase founded on credulities which the splendid human progress of recent years is supposed to have shattered. Anyone with a real knowledge of the Church in England to-day can see that the said credulities are dying fairly painless deaths; they fall off one by one; the immutable foundations must remain. Bach in his deep sincerity built on the rock in the 18th century, and so it comes about that his devotional music rings true in the twentieth. The childish parts of his faith fall easily out of count, while every word which can quicken the indomitable human longing for perfection, and which received glowing life at his hands, still carries conviction.

As may have been supposed, this book on Bach proves to be of nothing less than national, perhaps it would be nearer the mark to say European importance. Sir Hubert shows Bach to his readers in extraordinary detail; but throughout it is his ideal, colossal personality that is presented, for the most part in a searching and always devoted analysis of his music. In the actual title, on the first page, on the last, indeed throughout the book, stress is laid upon personality to an extent that to smaller minds may possibly be dangerous. It is true that in the short general discussion with which the book opens, the reader is warned of 'the nature which is individual only in its littleness'; and still more significantly, the author points out that 'the great artist becomes the exponent of his contemporaries.' Bach clearly became that; still more clearly he became the exponent of his successors also. Sir Hubert's book indeed goes to show that Bach expounded ideal human nature, as we sometimes perhaps rashly say, for all time. A paradox seems to lurk behind this mystery of personality, as behind most mysteries, for there is certainly a supreme quality in Bach's best work which may fitly be called impersonal; and there is a sense in which the personality becomes great precisely as it becomes impersonal. Indeed it seems true in art as in religion that 'whosoever loveth his personality shall lose it.' Sir Hubert's devotion for the person of Bach will not, it is to be hoped, get confused, even by the least close reader, with the false tendency (common enough to-day) sensationally to extol musical personality which attracts attention to and asserts itself. It is Bach's humanity that is here held up for our veneration.

'No other master,' writes Sir Hubert, 'shows in small things as in great, the same degree of consistent humanity.' Further on he says:

His humanity manifested itself in many and various ways. He delighted in frank rhythm. No composer ever attained to anything approaching the spontaneity, freshness and winsomeness of his dances . . . ; while many of his great choruses and his instrumental fugues are inspired with a force of rhythmic movement which thrills the hearer with a feeling of being swept into space out of the range of common things. But his ample humanity is equally shown in his love of melody.

There is, near the end of the book, a longer passage still more significant, which must also be quoted here:

It is the quality of the personality in Bach's work which is of such supreme importance and interest. Even if men on the advice of their chosen prophets abandon the old theory of the sincerity and nobility of art, human nature at least will pay tribute to the greatness of spirit, nobility of disposition, sincerity and singleness of heart which are so amply displayed. The foundation of Bach's musical personality is devotionalism. But it was a devotionalism so spacious and comprehensive that a large portion of its manifestations were emotions applicable to human life at large in its noblest phases.

So it is to his 'ample humanity' and the 'quality' of his personality and his 'spacious and comprehensive' devotion that the reader's attention is called; and Sir Hubert's sheer love of Bach for these things shines through the whole book and compels the reader to love and admire with him. When such admiration is combined with high critical powers and clear-sightedness, a great book is the natural result. It is to be hoped, in passing, that the author is a little too pessimistic when he pictures men and 'chosen prophets' who disavow 'sincerity and nobility of art.' Nobility, it is true, is an abused word, capable of a false reading, provocative of foolish and wasteful dissensions. But sincerity unites all schools; it claims and is claimed by everyone. It is surely the moralistic rather than the moral—Stevenson's 'Canting Moralists' in art—that annoys and sets up the back of the ardent reformer and so-called freethinker in music, whose thoughts are often the most restricted of all.

The plan of the book is as excellent as it is unusual. It is shown to be pre-eminently true in Bach's case, that biography can be adequately revealed in a man's works. Sir Hubert sees in the absence of legends about this great man a 'very high compliment.' He lives in the works themselves. 'Lesser minds are baulked by this, but those who are capable of communion with the highest manifestations of the human spirit are fortified.' But for all this the natural craving for some light upon the daily life of so great a 'spiritual ancestor' is admitted; and although according to the deliberate plan of the book the story is told in illuminating analyses of the works in chronological order, the author seems to find great delight, as his readers undoubtedly will, in the light touches of biographical detail which, it must be added, are marshalled in a masterly fashion. He does not, like Spitta, feel bound to give the births, deaths, marriages, or careers of remote relations, or discuss water-marks in the paper used by Bach. But the reader is given such felicitous things as the young organist's reply to the rebuke of the authorities at Arnstadt, who reminded him that he had leave for four weeks and stayed four months: Bach, in reply, 'hoped his deputy had replaced him satisfactorily'! The refreshing impertinence of this remark must be taken together with the facts that Bach was already in hot pursuit of artistic excellence, for which four months at Lübeck may have seemed as four days to him: and that the unsympathetic authorities proceeded to complain that his variations on the chorales were 'surprising,' that he bewildered the congregation with 'many strange sounds,' that his preludes had been too long, and that when it had been pointed out to him he had made them too short.

In a preliminary chapter called 'Convergences,' the musical conditions preceding Bach's advent are summed up with Sir Hubert's well-known mastery of the internal evidences of musical history. In the chapter headed 'Preliminaries,' Bach's early surroundings are discussed; the happy combination of church and secular influences is specially noted; his successive moves to Ohrdruff, Lüneburg, Arnstadt, Mühlhausen and Weimar, and his journeys to Hamburg, Weimar and Lübeck are told. The consequent influences of Böhm, Reinken and Buxtehude are shown, and many of his earlier works described—notably the 'Capriccio' upon the departure of his brother, that early and surprising contribution to Programme music. The chapters which follow are successively called by the places in which Bach then worked—Weimar, Cöthen, Leipsic; in these lengthy chapters his compositions in those places are summarized and extensively analysed. The later Leipsic works, however, from the 'St. Matthew Passion' onwards, overflow into many separate chapters, being skillfully grouped under the titles Motets, Masses, Oratorios, the Latest Cantatas, the Clavierübung, &c., in such a way that, with the exception of the chapter on Secular Cantatas, there is no serious break in the progressive development of Bach's personality as reflected in his music. By this means the musical reader gradually feels the evolution of Bach's work and powers to be as engrossing as some fine book of travel. The lover of his music will time after time come across tenderly discriminating descriptions of the familiar masterpieces, and such accounts of those which are less well known as will probably send the reader straight to them to learn and to love them for himself. In the preface there is a quasi-apology for the technicalities which are necessarily discussed throughout the book. But seldom do these technicalities prove troublesome; for they are illumined by the author's unflinching affection for his subject and by his keen comments which constantly quicken the reader's confidence and give insight into the musical history of the time. More than biographical issues are thus involved. For example, on p. 71 an experimental Clavier toccata is under discussion, and the situation is summed up in the following sentence: 'Bach was here trying to transfer an organ form to the clavier in terms of the Italian style.' On p. 90 the author discovers in the composer's choral work the 'habit of mind of watching for formulas which were apt for the pedals and which fortunately were effectively presentable by voices.' Again he throws light on Bach's two distinct uses of accessory ornamental or rapid passages—those which 'minister to a sense of exuberance of feeling, exaltation, fervour,' and those which form what may be called an 'expressive melisma.' Further, Sir Hubert is fond of showing how, by the scope of his gifts and by his deliberate plan of assimilating and improving upon the best works of every available sort, Bach practically gathered all the important threads of musical development into his own hand, weaving them as it were into one splendid strand, from which they all derived fresh strength. This is why the book often reads like a general history of music, without leaving its particular subject.

It is difficult to give more than slender indications of the methods and suggestive points of view to be found in this fine book. Few things are more interesting than the way in which Sir Hubert justifies Bach's habit of transferring movements from one work to another, notably from a secular to a sacred work. A musician who, like Abt Vogler, builds 'broad on the roots of things,' is likely habitually to express the deep, underlying human vitality of the words in hand; and in this case the same shade of energy may well inspire almost identical movements in connection with such different subjects as 'Die Wahl des Hercules' and the Christmas Oratorio. It is pointed out that, though perhaps unconsciously, 'special definite sentiments very often suggested to Bach similar types of musical figures'; and further, Sir Hubert predicts that

The clue to a great many of Bach's instrumental works may in future be found in the identification of the types of figure which are always related in his mind to particular moods and phases of sentiment.

In the touching chapter called the End, the highest point is assuredly reached. Never, it may be supposed, has the death of a great man been recorded before in a simple and pathetic strain of music; and never, surely, have deep affection and fine reticence conspired to frame a more moving final paragraph. It came about, we are told, that his last work, in the form (chorale) that he loved so dearly, was finished on his deathbed:

It is said that some time before, he had begun a chorale prelude on the tune Wenn wir in höchsten Nöthen sein ('When we are in deepest need'). He now completed it—tradition says by dictating the music to his pupil and son-in-law Altnikol—and with touching sincerity of devotion he altered the title from the piteous expression of deepest need to the words Vor deinen Thron tret ich ('I come before Thy throne!'). Death had always had a strange fascination for him, and many of his most beautiful compositions had been inspired by the thoughts which it suggested. And now he met it, not with repinings or fear of the unknown, but with the expression of exquisite peace and trust. Music had been his life. Music had been his one means of expressing himself, and in the musical form which had been most congenial to him he bids his farewell; and only in the last bar of all for a moment a touch of sadness is felt, where he seems to look round upon those dear to him and to cast upon them the tender gaze of sorrowing love.

And with that last phrase his earthly labours ended, on July 28, 1750.

There is a long Postscript which not only sums up Bach's work and influence, but discusses the modern musical situation with more than a passing significance. It should frankly be admitted that there are signs of haste and faults of style in the book. Yet in spite of this, and bearing also fully in mind the unique extent and power of Sir Hubert's contributions both to English music and to musical criticism, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that he has done nothing finer than this discerning and faithful delineation of Johann Sebastian Bach.

A NOTE ON DEBUSSY.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

Where is historical criticism likely to 'place' Debussy in the long run? There can be little temerity in asking the question now, and trying to answer it. As I have urged in another connection, criticism is authorised to-day in attempting what would have been almost impossible in the past, when most people had to judge new music merely by an occasional hearing of it. Nowadays not only are performances more frequent, but practically everything a composer writes is made accessible to the student by printing; so that a year's hard work at even the newest composer will tell a modern student more about him than he could have learned in twenty years under the old system. And as Debussy has now been writing for something like twenty-six years, and there has been ample opportunity to study everything he has done, criticism can try to see and state the main results of it all without incurring the usual foolish gibe of being incompetent to estimate the value of contemporary art.

Of Debussy's present and ultimate importance in history there can be no question. He has stemmed, partially at all events, the vast and heavy tide of German music, showed us that music can talk beautifully and interestingly without talking German, and has made the most advanced Teutonic art of the day seem to some people like the music of an epoch that is almost past. To have done anything like this, a man must have a great deal of vital force in him; whatever errors he may make, into whatever excesses or artificialities he may fall, there must be something seminal in his thinking. The question is, how much of his work will give pleasure in another generation or so, and how much of it will be regarded as the first stammerings of an art that has not yet fully mastered the language it would speak? It is possible for a man to give the most powerful and fruitful stimulus to art, and yet for little or nothing of his own work to outlive him. It was so, for example, with the Florentine reformers who founded the opera. On the other hand, the greatest and most enduring art seems to come only at the end of a long period of evolution, and to be as much the expression of a race or an epoch as of the individuality that utters it. Thus Bach breaks hardly any new ground for himself; he simply sums up and perfects the thinking of a century of musicians of all schools. His music could have had nothing like the strangeness, the sense of a wholly new voice, to Reinken and the other survivors of the old brigade as Debussy's music, for example, would have to a Strauss or a Wagner. One may broadly say, in fact, that this extremely new and personal note in art is the indisputable mark of a mind too individual in its sensations and its outlook to be capable of seeing the world very much as humanity as a whole does—which is what gives the greatest men their universal appeal. 'C'est dans les poètes du second ordre,' says Théophile Gautier à propos of Villon, 'que se trouve le plus d'originalité et d'excentricité. C'est même à cause de cela qu'ils sont des poètes du second ordre. Pour être grand poète, du moins dans l'acceptation où l'on prend ce mot, il faut s'adresser aux masses et agir sur elles . . . Dix vers de Byron sur l'amour, sur le peu de durée de la vie, ou sur tout autre sujet aussi neuf, trouveront plus d'admirateurs que la vision la plus étrange de Jean Paul ou d'Hoffman: cela vient de ce que beaucoup de gens ont été ou sont amoureux, qu'un plus grand nombre encore a peur de mourir, et qu'il en est bien peu qui aient vu passer, même en rêve, les fantastiques silhouettes des conteurs allemands.' Edmund Gurney hit upon the same line of thought in his brilliant article on 'The Appreciation of Poetry,' where he argues that the poetry most companionable (happy epithet!) to a man is that which 'is most in harmony with familiar strains of thought and feeling; which, instead of encountering friction and resistance, or having to carve out its channel to his affections by sheer dint of beauty, finds channels already marked out for it to fill and overflow,' and that the moral sentiments being the most profoundly rooted in us [using 'moral,' of course, not in any merely didactic sense, but as expressing the deepest feelings of humanity as a whole upon the origin and destiny and meaning of life and the world], 'it is impossible, ceteris paribus, but that that poetry should convey most spiritual wealth, and involve the greatest number of enriched minutes, which is in recognizable harmony with these sentiments, rather than poetry which is either markedly self-centred or markedly visionary and fantastic.'

Here we have a clear explanation, I think, of the difference between the greatest minds in music, like those of Bach, Beethoven and Wagner, and the smaller minds, like that of Debussy; he is self-centred, visionary and fantastic where the others just exhibit normal human nature transfigured by genius. To say this is not to imply that the fantasies of a Debussy are not well worth having in art; but it may help us to estimate his future standing, and to see the complete sterility to which any art that is merely imitative of him is foredoomed,—for his disciples can imitate only the idiom in which the fantasy incarnates itself, without being able to achieve the fantastic point of view that gave rise to the idiom. No one, I presume, will dispute the extremely personal character of most of Debussy's thinking; it is, indeed, one of the bars to his appreciation by people who have spent their lives in wholly different mental worlds. The trouble with Debussy is that he seems to have made a fetish of his own individuality. Looking at his work as a whole, it is impossible not to feel that very frequently he is not writing in a given way because that is the way he feels, but because that is the way he feels Debussy ought to feel. This excessive self-concentration—perhaps it may be called self-satisfaction—is certainly one of the signs of a genius that is limited. The bigger men go out to meet life with both hands open wide: a Debussy rather superciliously bolts and bars his door, and admits only so much of life within his house as is coloured the way he would have coloured it himself could he have been the maker of it. In his fastidiousness, his intellectual seclusion, his air of patronising aloofness from other minds, his making a kind of little artistic temple for his own personal worship, with a sacrosanct ritual of its own, he is the supreme type of the aristocrat in art: the man intensely proud of his own blue blood, firmly convinced that his own class is a caste apart, and with an attitude at once a little stiff, a little contemptuous, and a little condescending to those who are of what he takes to be a lower caste. If I were sure that the term would be taken in its purely psychological sense, without any offensive imputation, I should say that in a fair proportion of his work he is a musical snob. We are not surprised to learn from M. Louis Laloy that Debussy was a frequenter of the circle of Mallarmé, whose 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune' he was afterwards to set to such exquisite music. Now Mallarmé is the supreme type of the snobbism of the self-elected aristocracy of art. The type is almost unconsciously sketched by Mr. Arthur Symonds in his article on Mallarmé in 'The Symbolist Movement in Literature.' 'Might it not, after all,' he says, 'be the finest epitaph for a self-respecting man of letters to be able to say, even after the writing of many books: I have kept my secret, I have not betrayed myself to the multitude?' Observe the smug self-satisfaction at feeling oneself to be better than the multitude, at having a 'secret' that one has not betrayed to the common herd, even after having written many books; though Mallarmé, as Mr. Symonds says: 'seldom condescended to write,' and, when he did so, wrote 'in a manner which certainly saved him from intrusion.' Is there not something of this absurd vanity and complacency in certain of Debussy's works—something of the solemn pose of the oracle condescending to the multitude, but being careful to speak in a language not too likely to reveal the 'secret' except to the very elect? It is always minds of this class—not the first class—that adopt this attitude; they usually make it a point of their creed to produce no more in all their lives than an exiguous volume or two, being as vain of the very slenderness of their output as a fashionable young lady is of her wasp-like waist. And in both cases the broad, healthy sense of the world passes the phenomenon by with little more than a glance and a smile.

For my own part, though a good deal of Debussy's music gives me intense pleasure, and almost all of it is very interesting, I think that much of it will in time go the way of all affectation—for that both the matter and the manner are often affected will hardly be denied by anyone who knows the work thoroughly. Paradoxically enough, Debussy's affectation is only the other side of his sincerity and originality. His real achievements are on the one hand to have extended our harmonic sense and set melody free, teaching it to flow into light and sinuous arabesque, and on the other hand to have brought within the range of musical expression a number of states of the soul and aspects of the world that have hitherto been beyond that range. This latter point is hard to elucidate in language; but we all feel dimly that in certain parts of 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' the 'Chansons de Bilitis' and other of the vocal works, and in the 'Prélude à L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' he has given beautiful expression to emotions so fugitive that even music can hardly fix them, and that certainly no music has ever caught before; and that in pianoforte pieces like 'L'Isle Joyeuse,' 'Jardins sous la Pluie,' 'Masques,' and 'Mouvement' he has achieved the seemingly impossible feat of depicting the most indefinite things in the most definite way, in music that seems to be the very counterpart of nature itself with its capricious yet ordered rhythms, its freedom of movement, its shooting lights and changing shadows. It is impossible not to feel that in both these spheres Debussy has opened new doors to music, through which it will some day reach a fairyland rich in wonders. But has not his own sense and his originality, and perhaps the adulation of a coterie, done something to make the paradox of him that he is—at once the most natural and the most artificial of musicians? M. Laloy speaks of the 'simplicité supérieure' of his music. It has this, undoubtedly, at times; but at other times is it not visibly the most self-conscious, sophisticated music the world has ever seen, deliberately fashioned rather than dreamed? Debussy is, indeed, the prince of mannerists. He has so many of these mannerisms, all of which reappear in work after work, that it is a wonder there is any room left for veracity and appositeness to the subject in hand at the moment. His whole-tone scale is the most familiar of these; there are also certain harmonic formulæ, certain sequences, certain melodic turns, and of course a certain turn of psychology, that reappear in almost everything he has written. Some of the devices are palpable affectations; one might believe in their genuineness if he had used them only once, but not when he keeps repeating them in different works without rhyme or reason. This formula, for example (from the 'Danse Sacrée'):

wooden as it is, might be forgiven if hit upon once by a kind of accident, or even thrown out as an experiment; but it looks very vacant and foolish when used a second or third time, as in the opening of 'Et la lune descend sur le temple qui fut':

Left hand the same, an 8ve lower.

The worst of things like this is that they are so easily imitated, and that the poorest imitation is hardly distinguishable from the model. Play 'God save the King,' for instance, slowly, with an extra note or two in each chord, as in Example No. 1 above, and you will get an effect quite as good as that of any passage in which Debussy has employed the same device. If anyone tells me that in each of the passages in which Debussy does this kind of thing he is really obeying an impulse of the soul that could not possibly find expression in any other way, I shall beg leave to differ. Debussy is simply flaunting one of the badges of the Debussyan order, self-consciously, self-complacently.

He is discovering, I fancy, that pioneer work is not so easy as it may have seemed to him some fifteen or twenty years ago. It is a lonely thing, as Mr. Shaw's prize-fighter says, to be a champion. To do much building you need the help of other men; if you disdainfully reject their bricks, and refuse to build with any but those of your own making, you will find, in very little time, that the substance of these becomes thin and the pattern monotonous. This is the penalty Debussy is paying for being original beyond the safety-line. It is all very well to be a leader, as John Russell Lowell, I think, said, but you must not get the other side of the hill. Debussy having done all that could be done with his new ideas and his new style, is now brought practically to a standstill (for his latest work is largely a repetition of his earlier) for want of a technique adequate to his thinking. A new technique of this kind cannot be worked out by any one man; it needs the labours of something like a generation of artists. First of all the new spirit makes a new technique; then this, in its turn, liberates new thought. Much of Debussy's style has all the signs of an undeveloped (new) technique that are familiar to students of art in general. He sees a way—and all credit to him—into a new field; but not the way out. Hence the impression he so often gives us of feeling confusedly after a new style that he has only half or a quarter mastered. In passages of this kind, for example, (from the 'Danse Sacrée'):

which might be paralleled by a score of others from different works, we see the stiffness of movement that is an indubitable token of the infancy of an art, the struggle of an undeveloped technique against the unmanageability of the material. Passages of this kind always suggest to me the stiff, awkward folds of the raiment in early Greek sculpture; the artist sees what he wants, but cannot attain to it. And not having become full master of his material, not having yet won perfect flexibility of style, he necessarily repeats his formulæ until one wearies of them. Debussy builds up a page with stiff, detached formulæ of this order very much as a child builds up a map by putting coloured blocks together. The method admits of no shading, no atmosphere, no perspective, no illusion; it is hard, over-direct, and somewhat crude. Moreover, the device is so unmistakable that after a few repetitions of it it becomes almost unbearable. When the fifth act of 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' for instance, opens with that primitive solid-block movement that we have heard so often before:

the only effect it has on me is one of boredom, and a desire that Debussy would give us something new instead of this stale old tag, which seems always thrusting itself forward so irrelevantly. We have all seen troupes of performing dogs, in which one humorist has a certain little trick to do in the intervals between the more serious shows. As the performance goes on, the trick evidently becomes a mere habit with the dog; and he keeps doing it automatically long after it has ceased to be interesting or amusing. I get the same impression every now and then with regard to some of the tricks of 'Pelléas' and the other works.

In an article that is the merest outline of the thesis it is meant to suggest, I cannot go further into these points, or into the question of the relation of the music to the drama in 'Pelléas et Mélisande.' To me, a good deal of the opera is incomparably beautiful and touching; but much of it seems a mere evasion of the problem of writing continuous dramatic music. It is really quite easy to let the voice declaim, almost in monotone, over a chord that alters now and then; and almost equally easy to get a poignant effect of a bar or so's duration by some far-sought richness of harmony. The great problem of art is not to think in snatches, like this, but to think continuously. Here, again, Debussy, precisely because he is the pioneer, cannot enter into the Promised Land. Probably after a hundred musicians have cultivated this new genre for twenty years, there will come the composer who will sum it all up in a masterwork or two, as Bach and Beethoven and Wagner did with the tendencies of earlier and contemporary men. An opera that should be as wholly fine as the best parts of 'Pelléas,' written throughout in a continuous style that should be to the Debussy idiom in general what 'Tristan' is to the Wagner idiom, would indeed be something worth having. But at present 'Pelléas' can surely not be regarded, except by fanatical admirers of the composer, as anything but a work of transition, wonderfully beautiful in parts, and skilful almost everywhere, but certainly not homogeneous in tissue. The proposition, I think, could be fully established by detailed reference to the score; but space at present does not permit of that. All I have tried to do in this article is to suggest some three or four of the lines along which criticism of Debussy will probably proceed in another ten years. He is a transition-type. Not he, but others, will reap the best of what he has sown. It is his misfortune to begin an epoch, not to end one.

MUSINGS IN A LIBRARY.

III.

I was just congratulating myself upon the possession of two unusual luxuries—an idle afternoon and a new score to read. Thirsting for more exhilarating draughts than the ancients can bestow, I had despatched my good-natured minion to buy, borrow, or steal me a copy of César Franck's Symphony. He executed the commission (I asked no details), and now I promised myself a peaceful, happy hour. Vain hope! Scarcely have I settled down to enjoy myself when the door bursts open and my friend Tinker dashes in. He always dashes in and talks excitedly at the top of his voice. An excellent fellow and a first-class musician, but always strenuous and in deadly earnest. He opens his mouth menacingly.

'I know what you are going to say,' I cut in (one's only chance is to get there first), 'you are going to ask me what I think of Elektra. Once and for all I forbid the subject. Neither you nor I should have anything to say about it.'

'O come, now,' he remonstrates, 'we may think what we like, but we can't afford to ignore a work of such—'

'Pardon me,' I interrupt him firmly, 'I repeat that we should not say anything about it. To criticise new works, whatever their importance, is the province of two classes of the community, the critics and the general public. Leave it to them.'

'But the musician's opinion is the only one worth having!'

'Not at all; any critic will tell you that it is sure to be prejudiced, and therefore of no value.'

'Well, critics are always very keen to know it, all the same.'

'There may be reasons for that, not unconnected, as a journalist would say, with considerations of copy. But you should learn not to give yourself away, and not to do any other man's job for him.'

'O, I am sure I don't want to talk about the beastly thing; there are plenty more agreeable subjects. What's that score?'

'Never mind,' I say, shutting it up. 'I want to preach to you a bit. Do you know that if we musicians—yes, I am a sinner, too—could but hold our tongues and not criticise one another, we should be much better off? I remember the old critic J— saying to me "Not one of us criticises the English composer half so bitterly, or does him half so much harm as his fellow does."'

'I'm afraid that's true, but it's difficult to help it, with the amount of bosh one has to encounter and—'

'It is simply a matter of self-control. Every man of the world knows he will never get on if he blurts out all the faults of his neighbours. You despise a scandal-mongering woman; is not an artistic scandal-monger as bad? If you want native art to flourish, it is not enough to praise it in the bulk but in the sample, and when you come across shocking bad specimens simply refrain from drawing attention to them.'

'Yes, that's all very well, but it's easier said than done. One can't help feeling very bitter sometimes.'

'Can't one?' I smile at him. 'Are you still longing after the Dead Sea apple of Fame? I thought you a wiser man.'

His next speech it were not wise to print. He uses no bad words—wherein most masculine souls find a balm for their wounds—but he rages eloquently at the established order of things for twenty minutes by the clock. Certainly, it is hard that a man who has produced a large number of works of really lofty aim—works which have been noticed with respect—should, after a twelve months' silence, find himself forgotten and have to begin de novo, but the deplorable fact that no one seems any longer to have any memory is, I suppose, the result of the stress under which modern life exists. It is of no use getting angry when the mortifying fact of one's total insignificance is made apparent.

I put my hand on his shoulder and silently place the César Franck score before his eyes. There is an expressive silence of several minutes.

'O yes, yes, I know!' he says, with a deep sigh and very real emotion. 'Of course I know he was a great man; a very great man, and he went through all this and more and never got an atom of appreciation, except from his pupils and immediate friends and—'

'A tolerably large exception, that, Tinker,' I hint. 'What can any man want more than to know that he has done the best that was in him, and to have a few chosen friends know it? Some haven't even that. Think of my old friend O—— and those monumental scores which his widow keeps locked up at the bank! Even I, his one friend, didn't altogether appreciate his work, although I respected it, and he died knowing that wealth had come too late and that he would never shine before the world. But these men did not grizzle; that's the point; they did not complain, and they did not envy others who had better luck. Let us try and be like them, shall we?'

Tinker nods, and takes his leave, more subdued than I have ever known him, while I muse on his really hard lot.

Just as I am about to resume my studies another interruption occurs. A second and much older visitor—Rugeley, the wisest and most amiable of teachers, looking worn and sad and in need of a good holiday—as well he may be, poor soul!

'I am tired—tired out,' he sighs, and sinks into a seat.

'Little beasts! Are they more unmusical than usual?'

'It isn't that, but I have been recalling my monotonous life of the last forty years. Think of it—the honest teacher's life! To go on saying the same things thousands and thousands of times over with equal earnestness and conviction . . . Yes, as you say, like a clergyman—to keep up that earnestness all the time, whether one feels it or not, every day, each year, from youth to old age. Pupils come with ever fresh energies, most of them keenly eager to get good value for their money, and however exhausted he may become, he would be defrauding them and failing in his common duty if he betrayed a symptom of fatigue. So the years fly ever more and more quickly; pupils drain and sap his energy and pass away; others succeed them, fresh as flies, but he—whence is he to draw a fresh stock of vitality and enthusiasm? He began life, of course, with high ideals and ambitions of personal success as a performer or composer; he sacrifices these aims to the necessity of mere subsistence, the new work grows, becomes the one interest of his life, his only possible present and future, yet an existence as dreary as that of a bank clerk and without even the prospect of retiring on a pension when one is worn out. Is such a life worth living?'

'Depends on the liver,' I reply, unsympathetically, for this kind of talk should not be encouraged. 'I suppose it is scant comfort to point out that thousands of useful working lives are as devoid of climax and joyful end as that you describe.'

'It is no comfort. Do you remember your own splendid teacher, S——? He slaved on like this until he was seventy, and then, having outlived all family and friendly ties, and feeling his powers begin to decay, he quietly ended his own life. That is what I feel inclined to do.'

'By all means,' I rejoin philosophically; 'but I fail to see what you gain by such a course, and you lower yourself considerably in the estimation of your fellows. Think! A cab horse does his duty to the end, and limps cheerfully to the knacker's yard. You would think it not playing the game if he ended matters by taking his cab, his driver and fare over the steps of the Thames Embankment. I give you that illustration because no man stands so alone in the world that his impatient shuffling off this mortal coil will not hurt someone else.'

'Old S—— was quite lonely; his death hurt no one.'

'It hurt me more than you would think, and may have incited some weak-minded former pupils to follow his example. Did you ever read this man's life?' I put the César Franck score before him.

'No.'

'César Franck, whether you care for his music or not, was one of the truest artists that ever lived. He ran about Paris all day, every day, all his life, teaching the pianoforte to school-girls—French school-girls—you know what they are, and filled up his scraps and corners of time by composing in the loftiest of veins. Brave fellow! He tried to write pot-boilers, but it was of no use. He obtained practically no recognition during his life; none at all till he was sixty, but he was beloved in his own circle, and is now one of the great masters.'

'Now! Nice comfort that! Do you believe in a future state?'

I know my friend to be sincerely religious, so I answer discreetly.

'Then can you imagine a worse torment than to look down into this world and see the honour and fame that might have been yours—that you longed for—all coming too late? To say nothing of unworthy strangers making money out of your greatness.'

'All that is very silly,' I reply. 'Fame during lifetime means twenty-five per cent. of your friends praising you, and all the rest of the world sneering and saying spiteful things. Posthumous fame warms the hearts that need warming and, as to the money, they may as well make it out of you as out of india-rubber.'

He sighs again, and departs, while I remain musing with the unread score in my hands. If the example of César Franck's modest and manly life can bring comfort to only a few unhappy souls like my two visitors, why, it were better to have been this man than many an honoured fraud whose pretentious works surround me. Yes, I will direct the minion to turn out those eighteen huge volumes to-morrow, and César Franck's half-a-dozen poor little scores shall have their place.

Occasional Notes.

With the close of the Hallé, Gentlemen's, and other regular series of concerts, the thoughts of Manchester musical amateurs naturally fly to next winter's arrangements. Undoubtedly the most important item of recent musical news has been the announcement in the local press, on April 12, that Herr Ernest Denhof was in Manchester making preliminary arrangements for a performance of Wagner's 'Ring' dramas. On Easter Monday, in the course of a most able leading article on 'Opera in Manchester,' the Manchester Guardian said:

If there is one town in England, other than London, that is capable of becoming a capital of musical art, it is Manchester. Our training in the highest forms of music began before that of most towns, and we have a tradition of which we are justly proud. There is a good deal to be said for the view that music is the form of art that makes most natural and easiest appeal to Lancashire. It is rarely that the same people will develop a high artistic sensibility both through eye and ear, and our grey skies and murky atmosphere, which are unfavourable to refined sense of visual form and colour, tend to enhance our sympathy with beauty of sound and of internal, introspective emotion. . . . We feel strongly that no town can be said to cultivate art successfully unless it creates new forms and new examples as well as interprets the old ones. Manchester is a great centre of musical interpretations within a certain range, but it has not shown a very quick sympathy with new forms, and with one or two exceptions it has done nothing in musical composition. That means, to our thinking, that the art of music is not the living force that it might be amongst us . . . not in the highest sense an art that is really naturalised here, and that is why the need for opera is so much felt in Manchester. . . . As the drama has the advantage over the novel that it is an act of social and public life, so the opera may be said to be superior to other forms of musical art—it is music on its social and public side. That is why we can never completely naturalise music in our corporate life without opera, and further, why opera is necessary for the successful cultivation of the art of composition.

Dr. Henry Watson has retired from the conductorship of the Manchester Vocal Society. He became chief director in 1885, and under his able guidance the Society has achieved a great reputation. Since its establishment in 1866 the Society has given 276 concerts, at which 1,779 separate compositions have been performed. Dr. Watson, in bidding his farewell, at the concert given on March 23, said:

Let me only add that I desire to acknowledge the Providence that has associated my personal as well as my musical fortunes with the history of the Manchester Vocal Society through the whole period of its existence, and enabled me to be present, with five or six exceptions (not once through sickness), at every one of its musical gatherings, and that though I now retire from official connection with it, the memories with which it has encompassed me will remain to the end of my life in a gracious and grateful companionship.

Readers who would like to know more of Dr. Watson's career and work are referred to the Musical Times for June, 1909. A portrait was also given in that number.

In the Yorkshire Post for March 3, there may be found an admirably-written article on the subject of the projected new organ for the Municipal Concert Hall at Hull, which, we are given to understand, is to be equipped with mechanism for the reproduction of farmyard and meteorological effects. The writer takes the perfectly just view that if the good people of Hull provide the money, they are entitled to buy any sort of organ which appeals to them. But he also deplores the fact that the instrument is to be built with a view to pandering to the taste of the unthinking and uneducated and that, in his own words, 'the main object of those who have been prominent in promoting the scheme seems to be to keep the people out of the streets—to provide, in short, a sort of adult crèche.' And later, 'provided sufficient decency be observed to evade the attention of the police, the artistic and elevating quality of the entertainment does not matter: then all opposition to such trifles as storm pieces and battle scenes depicted by an adroit manipulator of a tricky organ falls to the ground. The musical part of the entertainment must then be placed in the same category as the cinematograph or ventriloquist performances which were referred to in the course of the Hull inquiry.' We could quote much more by this able writer, but recommend our readers to obtain a copy of the paper.

It is indeed deplorable that the efforts of modern education in the art of legitimate music should be rendered ineffective by a determination to stoop to the taste of those who need refinement. We have before us a programme of a so-called organ recital which must have tended to lower the standard of those who were unfortunate enough to be present at its performance. But though we prefer not to include this programme in our list of recitals, we do not wish it to be thought that we cavil at the legitimate organ transcription. It is the use of 'bells, thunder, warbling birds, pattering hail' and other hare-brained absurdities which moves us to plead for the recognition of sane organ-building and organ-treatment. No wonder the organ is unpopular with musicians. The organist who indulges himself and those who listen to him in such abuse is in much the same position as the popular footballer—he, instead of the game, becomes the central figure. Surely the true artist abnegates himself in his endeavour to reproduce the ideals of the composer. We conclude by quoting again from the Yorkshire Post article: 'Many people, however, will incline to the view that a municipality would be better advised if, instead of entering into competition with the music-halls, which provide excellent amusement at small cost, it confined its attention to elevating and educating the community. Organ recitals by an organist who is not merely smart, but possesses an artistic conscience, may do much in this direction, not only by playing real organ music but by introducing the people to the great orchestral works, symphonies, overtures and the like. But when he puts before the public meretricious music, storm fantasias and such stuff, he is, from this point of view, simply wasting public money.' We must add 'hear, hear!'

The library of the late Mr. F. G. Edwards, editor of the Musical Times, was successfully disposed of at Puttick & Simpson's on April 18. Mr. Quaritch paid £70 for some Mendelssohn letters and an autograph score of the orchestration of 'O come every one.' The original MS. score sheets used by the soloists at the first performance of 'Elijah' at the Birmingham Festival in 1846, were purchased, also by Mr. Quaritch, for £9 5s.

A concert given on March 29, by the Harrow School Musical Society, deserves more than ordinary notice. The programme was as follows :

Fantasia in A major, for the Pianoforte	THE COMPOSER.	L. C. Mandleberg.
Song	'Adieu, my native shore'	THE COMPOSER.	..	G. M. Mayer.
Violin and Organ—	Adagio (on a ground bass) and Allegretto	THE COMPOSER.	..	H. Gardner.
Pianoforte Solos—
(a) Prelude
(b) Fantasia: 'The Distractions of Fourth School' (founded, by permission, on the notes A. F. H.)	THE COMPOSER.	M. G. Davidson.
Song	'To Anthea'	R. R. GLEN.	..	G. C. Davis.
Two Sketches for Pianoforte	THE COMPOSER.	J. R. Lewis.
Trumpet Solo	'Minuet'	G. E. CHADWICK.	..	H. G. T. Butlin.
Marcia Funèbre, for Organ			..	A. M. Jessup.
Prelude in F minor, for Pianoforte			..	R. W. S. Mendl.
Three Songs: (a) 'The Dhooon'			..
(b) 'Song'			..
(c) 'Thy voice is heard'			..	M. G. Davidson.
	R. O. JACKSON.

Every one of the pieces was composed by boys at present at the School. We know nothing of the merits of the music, but we have nothing but admiration for the policy of Professor Buck (as we are now glad to name him) in thus stimulating whatever latent talent there is in the great School over which in musical matters he now ably presides.

York is to have a Musical Festival on July 20 and 21. It will be held in the Exhibition buildings. The programme of the four concerts to be given includes 'Elijah,' 'King Olaf' (Elgar), a new dramatic Orchestral suite by Granville Bantock, the 'Enigma variations' (Elgar), and many other orchestral works. The artists engaged are Madame Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Herbert Brown, and Miss Fanny Davies (pianoforte solo). Sir Edward Elgar and Professor Bantock will conduct their own works, and Mr. T. Tertius Noble will conduct all the other works. We are glad to hear that there is every prospect of the festival being successful. Although the subscription list has been opened only recently, the tickets are being eagerly bought. Their Royal Highnesses The Prince and Princess of Wales have given their patronage, the Lord Archbishop of York is the President, and the list of supporters is a very influential one. The hon. secretaries are Miss Argles, Miss Jalland and Mr. Arthur Anderson.

THE IMPERIAL CHOIR.

Dr. Charles Harriss has organized, with the aid and support of the conductors of London, an Imperial choir of four thousand voices, recruited from over forty choral societies, for his annual Empire Day Concert. The Imperial singers are representative of the Royal Choral Society (unofficially), the Alexandra Palace Choir, the Novello Choir, Edward Mason's Choir, the Crystal Palace Choir, Teddington Philharmonic, Forest Hill Choral Society, Reigate and Purley Choral Societies, Emanuel Choir, Dulwich Philharmonic, Bermondsey Settlement Choral Society, East Ham Choral Society, South London Choral Association, Streatham Choral Society, Lavender Hill Choral Society, People's Palace Choir, City of London College Choir, Chiswick and Gunnersbury Choral Society, Willesden Green and Harrow Choral Societies, Stroud Green Choral Society, Ilford Choral Society, Walthamstow Choral Union, Barking Choral Society, Streatham Hill Choral Society,

Sunday School Union Choral Society, Brixton Oratorio Society, Bromley Choral Society, Lewisham Choral Society, South-West Choral Society, West Norwood Choral Society, Ealing Philharmonic, Ealing Choral Society, East Finchley and Muswell Hill Choral Society, Hither Green Choral Society, Central London Choral Society, Central Croydon Choral Society, Bexley Heath Choral Society, Buckhurst Hill Choral Society, Penge and Beckenham Choral Society, St. Peter's Brockley Choral Society, St. Saviour's, Denmark Park, Choral Society.

In association with Dr. Harriss, and responsible for each contingent, are the following well-known choral conductors: Mr. Allen Gill, Mr. W. W. Hedgcock, Mr. Edward Mason, Mr. Harold L. Brooke, Mr. W. G. Rothery, Mr. E. J. Quance, Mr. John Morgan, Mr. E. Stanley Roper, Mr. Harold Macpherson, Mr. M. Klickmann, Mr. W. Naylor, Mr. A. Thompson, Mr. Stanley Attwood, Dr. J. E. Borland, Mr. G. Lane, Mr. F. Wintersgill, Mr. Douglas Redman, Mr. F. Fertel, Mr. D. J. Thomas, Mr. D. M. Davis, Mr. E. Victor Williams, Mr. J. Cliffe Forrester, Mr. George R. Ceiley, Mr. F. W. Long, Mr. F. W. Belchamber, Mr. Frank Idle, Dr. Charles J. Frost, Mr. L. C. Venables, Dr. Cuthbert Harris, Mr. H. J. Timothy, Mr. W. Ratcliffe, Mr. J. Evans, Mr. S. Percy Bright, Mr. A. Bond, Mr. Otley Marshall, Mr. J. W. Smith, Mr. H. A. Donald, Mr. T. F. Tate, Mr. R. A. Richards, Mr. John E. West, and Dr. W. G. McNaught.

This year's Grand Empire Day Concert will inaugurate the official opening of the Festival of Empire and Pageant of London at the Crystal Palace on Tuesday, May 24, at 3.30 p.m., in the Centre Transept, on which occasion their Majesties The King and Queen have graciously consented to be present. Under the honorary direction of Dr. Harriss, the Imperial Choir, of which he is conductor, will make its debut at this important function, when it will be supported by an orchestra of five hundred instrumentalists, consisting of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, the Festival Orchestra, the Alexandra Palace Orchestra, the Crystal Palace Orchestra, the Stock Exchange Orchestra, the Crystal Palace Military Band and the Festival of Empire Military Band, with Madame Clara Butt as soloist.

GLUCK'S 'ORPHEUS.'

REVIVAL BY MISS MARIE BREMA.

Whether or not Miss Marie Brema intended to emphasise the fact that it is just fifty years this year since Madame Viardot introduced Gluck's 'Orpheus' to England at Covent Garden, or whether her wish was to repeat in London her success in the opera won in every part of the Continent, the truth remains that the revival of the work in the form of six performances, afterwards extended to nine, which she began on April 12 at the Savoy Theatre, was one of the best that has been seen in England. So far the performances given in this country have been remarkable solely for the work of the various representatives of the distraught husband. Within measurable time that of Signora Ravogli, seen in 1890, and the reading given by Madame Maria Gay at Drury Lane last year, remain in the memory. But the recollection is likely to become more dim now that Miss Brema has turned her attention to the opera, for her production of it was notable for its artistic completeness. Special attention was given to the work of the ballet and chorus, which has always been a weak point in the English performances, and the aim of the whole production was clearly to do justice to an opera which will always hold its place as a landmark in the path of this particular form of art.

The version put forward on this occasion was that of Berlioz, who combined the best features of the Viennese and Parisian editions with some of M. Gevaert's adaptations, which consist of the omission of the air at the end of the first act, and the substitution of a chorus taken from an earlier work for the anticlimax-making ballet at the end. The arrangement worked well. The scene of the 'Entrance to the Underworld' was made unusually convincing by the employment of a number of dancers, headed by Miss Margaret Morris, who had trained her subordinates to give a very realistic representation of the physical agonies of the unhappy earth-bound souls, and with like success to provide a very graceful picture of the spirits wandering in the Elysian Fields. This scene was particularly beautiful; in fact it has never before been made so impressive from a spectacular point of view, and the search for Eurydice was most touching. All Gluck's choral effects which have justly won for him the credit of being a musical realist were well brought out. The gradual succumbing of the people of the Underworld to the charms of Orpheus's lyre, indicated by the wonderful choral passages, was very well realised by an efficient chorus. The stage in this scene was a little crowded, but that may have been further intentional realism. The whole of the Elysian Fields scene, with its beautiful choruses and graceful movements, was remarkably effective.

Miss Marie Brema as Orpheus brought all her great powers as an actress and vocalist to bear on the part. She did not spare herself, nor did she save her vocal resources for the famous scena 'Che farò,' but gave a pathetic, expressive, and entirely convincing reading of the whole part, though at no point was it so pathetic as in the scene of Eurydice's death. The Eurydice was Miss Viola Tree, who with the familiar surroundings of the stage sang and acted with all point. Miss Pearl Ladd was a charming Amor, and sang her music thoroughly well. Identical vocal methods on the part of the principal singers, an intelligent chorus well drilled by Miss Florence von Etlinger, a ballet of 'classical' dancers, and a good orchestra directed with uncommon firmness by Herr Michael Balling, all helped to provide a production that was in many respects memorable, and above all thoroughly worthy of this glorious old opera.

SIR CHARLES SANTLEY AND THE LIVERPOOL SOCIETY ARMONICA.

The occasion of the 150th concert of the Liverpool Societa Armonica on April 16 was doubly interesting by reason of its being also the jubilee commemoration of Sir Charles Santley's connection with the Society. The combined celebration was a happy idea, and the presence of the veteran baritone in the best of health, in wonderful voice, and in full possession of all his vocal art, at the age of seventy-six, was the subject of hearty congratulations to him and also to the Societa Armonica, which has the distinction of being the oldest amateur orchestral Society in the Kingdom. Founded in 1847, it met for rehearsal at first in Lime Street, in a room which has long disappeared, thence removing to Bold Street, and then for a short time to the Medical Institute in Hope Street, until in 1853 the directors of the Liverpool Institute gave it a more permanent abode in their school building in Mount Street. Here it found a home for forty-two years, giving its concerts in the Institute Hall. In 1895 the Society was again compelled to look for accommodation elsewhere, and found it in the schools belonging to the Scotch Church in Oldham Street, which have become the headquarters ever since. The concerts since 1896 have been given in the small concert room in St. George's Hall. For the occasion under notice the more spacious Philharmonic Hall was engaged.

The roll of members of the Society includes many honoured names in the Liverpool musical world. As might be expected, no member of the orchestra that played at the first concert in the Royal Assembly Rooms, Great George Street, on June 18, 1849, now survives. The oldest member of the Society, and the best known and most honoured, is Sir Charles Santley, who played the violin in the orchestra for several years. He sang at the Society's concert on October 12, 1853, and now, after nearly fifty-seven years, honoured it by associating himself with its 150th concert. This is a record of which Sir Charles and the Society are proud. Among the names of notable amateurs at one time associated are those of Hugh Hornby, Rensburg, Sudlow, Armstrong, Laidlaw, Cafferata, Hazlehurst, Rabus, Sheldermine, and A. E. Rodewald, and among many members of the musical profession are included Henry Lawson (who acted as leader of the orchestra for over twenty years), E. W. Thomas, C. Herrmann, Haddrill, T. W. Lucas, F. Lucas, F. Weston, W. Hunter, Viola Akeroyd, Miss Backsheen Wood, and Mr. Garrod, the present leader. For many years the Society appears to have worked without a conductor, and it was not until 1866 that the first regular conductor (an amateur), Mr. Thomas Armstrong, was appointed. He held the position for twenty years, until his retirement in 1886, when Mr. C. E. Cafferata succeeded him. On the latter's death, in 1892, his son, Mr. Wilfred Cafferata, was elected to the position, which he held for three years, being succeeded, in 1896, by Mr. Vasco V. Akeroyd, who still happily fills the post.

The Society has had many vicissitudes. From 1854 to 1866 no concerts were given, and the organization languished somewhat during a period when amateur orchestral enterprise seemed to have died out altogether in the city. It is related of one of the early meetings that only five members turned up for rehearsal, and they all played the flute! On another occasion an unfortunate contretemps, not unconnected with that mutual jealousy which is apt to develop in amateur societies, caused the members of the brass and percussion sections of the orchestra to go 'on strike' on the evening of the concert, with results that can well be imagined. Even in later years the forgetfulness of a musician left the orchestra without a first oboe at the last minute, and as the second oboe, an amateur, was too nervous to step into the breach, the programme—including Beethoven's seventh Symphony—had to be played through with this important instrument missing!

Even if the support and cultivation of orchestral music by amateurs must be reckoned half-hearted during the earlier portion of the Society's history, there were not wanting those whose devotion to it is worthy of record. The place of honour must be assigned to Mr. J. B. Jackson, who played the clarinet, and subsequently the timpani, for thirty-five years, whilst Messrs. Ryland (oboe), Weatherill (viola) and T. W. Lucas could boast of memberships of between twenty and thirty years. Even in these later days, the president, Mr. Anthony Sheldermine, J.P., and the hon. secretary, Mr. J. Dudley Johnston, are both members of over twenty years' standing.

During the first forty years of the Society's existence, musical education and appreciation appear to have been at a low ebb in Liverpool, and little effort was made to bring the members of the orchestra or their audiences into touch with modern influences in music. Very few works of any importance by composers later than Mendelssohn and Spohr ever figured in the programmes. Amateur orchestral technique was evidently poor and uncertain, to judge by the extent to which the works of composers such as Kalliwoda, Romberg, Onslow, Ries and Molique were played. With Mr. Akeroyd's conductorship in 1896, a new spirit was infused. The aim then became not so much to place before audiences programmes of good music, as to educate the amateurs who passed through the ranks of the orchestra, to the appreciation of the best of classical and modern, and even the most advanced modern symphonic music, by that intimate acquaintance which comes with constant study and rehearsal. Thus the record of the past fourteen years includes all the symphonies of Brahms, of Schumann, of Beethoven, the principal ones of Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Tchaikovsky, Dvorák, and others. Many important works have been produced in Liverpool for the first time, amongst others the symphonies of Goetz, Strauss, Berger, Kaun, Kallinnikov, and orchestral compositions by Coleridge-Taylor, Elgar, Bantock, Sibelius, Sinigaglia, &c. We are indebted for this brief resumé to the well-written preface in the programme-book.

The progress and extension of musical knowledge, and great improvement in amateur technique since the Society's early days, found illustration in the programme of the 150th concert and its admirable performance by the orchestra of eighty-seven players, who were heard in the 'Meistersinger' overture, the symphony in G minor by Kallinnikov, the overture to Nicolai's 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' and in the accompaniments to Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, the solo in which was cleverly played by Miss Lena Kontorovitch. In addition songs were agreeably sung by Miss Aimée Kemball, accompanied by Mr. Branscombe. Chief public interest of course was centred in the hero of the evening, Sir Charles Santley. It surprised and delighted his admirers to find that while his wonderful vocal art is unimpaired, he has also been able to retain much of the old beauty of his mellow voice. This was shown in Handel's florid air from 'Otto' 'Del minacciar,' in the pathos of Nevin's 'Rosary,' the drama of Schubert's 'Erl King,' and the humour of the 'Leather Bottle' and Hatton's 'To Anthea' and 'Simon the Cellarer.' In the latter composer's songs and their interpreter, Liverpool's musical worthies were notably represented at this interesting and locally historic occasion.

THE NEW OPERATIC PLAN.

BY HERMANN KLEIN.

Not for many years has the approach of the London season revealed an operatic situation so fraught with interest—and maybe also with important consequences—as that which now confronts us. Does London care for opera sufficiently to support at one and the same time the equivalents of those two big Parisian institutions, the Grand Opéra and the Opéra-Comique?

Obviously if London does care sufficiently, it is quite capable of doing for two undertakings of widely different scope and purpose, what it did during best part of the last century for two great houses that clashed at every point of the operatic compass. The old rivalry between Covent Garden and Her Majesty's is charged with wonderful memories. It was glorious and it was costly. It endured for more years than it was commercially entitled to, because there was a superabundance of vocal genius at command; because London was its wealthiest market; and because society, from Royalty downwards, revelled in the enjoyment of pitting its favourite stars—its Jenny Linds and Grisis, its Patis and its Nilssons—against each other in the bills of the opposing establishments.

But nothing of that kind is in prospect now. Beyond the fact that the respective locales stand upon practically the same ground, there is really no analogy to justify the lover of coincidence in predicting that history is about to repeat itself. 'Her Majesty's Opera' has ceased to exist ever since Sir Herbert Tree reared his present theatre upon the site of the old building with the colonnade near the foot of the Haymarket. Covent Garden Theatre stands where it did; but twenty years have elapsed since Sir Augustus Harris dropped the middle word out of the 'Royal Italian Opera,' after having founded upon the ruins thereof a monopoly that no sensible man seems likely to challenge.

Mr. Thomas Beecham is eminently a sensible man. He has already afforded abundant proof both of wisdom and discretion in his direction of an opera season given under difficult conditions. What he is going to do at His Majesty's Theatre next month has absolutely nothing in common with the sort of enterprise that Mr. Oscar Hammerstein started at the Manhattan Opera House, New York, four years ago. That was a 'fight to a finish,' and the finish is not yet. That was an open and professed declaration of war in the field of grand opera, started by a single individual, bold, confident, daring to the verge of recklessness, in the face of the entrenched camp of millionaires known as the Metropolitan Opera Company.

And what is the present state of affairs as between those gigantic combatants, after four seasons of intense and bitter struggling for supremacy? No one quite knows: only that both sides are at this moment engaged in counting up the heaviest bill of losses they have yet incurred; only that their proud concentration of the most expensive operatic forces the world has ever known has so raised the market price of singers that financial disaster seems inevitable so long as the competition shall continue; only that New York, with all its untold wealth and its boasted craze for opera, has at last shown itself unequal to the task of supporting two homes of grand opera so luxuriant and extravagant as these.

But even without so terrible an example to deter him, Mr. Beecham is not, I repeat, the man to indulge in so much as the pale reflex of the operatic warfare which now shakes New York. Far more peaceful, far more beneficial is his present intent. He takes his cue, not from the other side of the Atlantic, but from nearer home. He perceives in the operatic life of France and Germany a something that England lacks. He sees that here in London we have no institution corresponding to the famous Opéra-Comique of Paris, which has so long and brilliantly flourished, not as the rival but as the complement of that other great lyric establishment, the Académie Nationale de Musique, better known as the Grand Opéra.

Thanks to their subsidies from the State, these houses contrive, with only a few weeks' relâche, to keep open all the year round, and incidentally to carry out their useful functions without affecting each other's receipts. Each in turn attracts the same public by supplying works of a different type and class, which appeal in an equal degree to the cultivated taste of the lovers of opera. If London can support its 'grand season' at Covent Garden for three months in the year, why should it not be able and willing to support opéra-comique during the same period? This is the question which Mr. Thomas Beecham has evidently been pondering, and which he is actually going to put to a practical test by his forthcoming season at His Majesty's.

In this country (as in America) all operatic enterprise upon a big scale must depend for ultimate financial success upon the extent of the subscription. Good average receipts tell up, of course, in the long run; but after all it is the subscribers' list that furnishes the backbone of the support. In view of the magnificent record achieved at Covent Garden for the approaching Royal Opera season, it will be interesting to see whether the amount of surplus energy and cash at the disposal of metropolitan opera-lovers will furnish a satisfactory point d'appui for the new opéra-comique venture. There is every reason to believe that it will.

Covent Garden ought to be the home of grand opera exclusively. It was originally built for that purpose. It was never well placed in the midst of London's largest fruit and vegetable market, but it has great traditions; it is admirably managed; and the artistic prestige of the 'Royal Opera' is well preserved alike in the personnel and the performances that mark the régime of the present Syndicate. At the same time it is ill-adapted for the representation of opéra-comique. It is too large for the complete enjoyment of intimate works that were designed for a smaller frame, above all those in which the dialogue ought to be spoken, not converted into incomprehensible recitative.

Hence the value and importance of the experiment that is about to be tried. There are many beautiful and successful works of the opéra-comique type which Covent Garden has no time to produce during the regular season and which, if they were given, would continue to be sung, as they are now, in French, German, or Italian. At His Majesty's all the operas, whether of this precise calibre or not, are to be sung in the English language; and the further we get away from the polyglot system, the further we shall advance in the right direction.

CARL REINECKE: AN APPRECIATION.

BY FRITZ VON BOSE, PROFESSOR AT THE CONSERVATOIRE, LEIPSIK.

With the death at Leipzig on March 10 of Carl Reinecke, the last noteworthy representative of the Mendelssohn-Schumann period, a chapter of musical history has been closed. His long and happy life of nearly eighty-six years, rich not only in labour but also in great achievements, is ended, and deeply he is mourned by countless people who had the good fortune to learn from him, whether as an artist or a personal friend, and especially by those to whom it was given to stand at the master's side till the last, and to refresh themselves at the spring of his noble, winning personality and never-resting intellect.

The thought alone that he first saw the light of the world when Beethoven, Schubert and Goethe were still among the living, and that he was in personal contact with Mendelssohn and Schumann, inspires a certain feeling of reverence for him.

For nearly fifty years Reinecke lived at Leipzig, and during thirty-five years of that time he was Kapellmeister of the Gewandhaus concerts, and for forty-two years was connected with the Conservatorium, first as Professor and later as Director of Studies. He was an artist of truly aristocratic and fine feeling, one who as pianist or conductor invariably made his own personality subordinate to the work he was interpreting. All who have heard him in his best years play a Mozart concerto, or the C minor of Beethoven, or have seen him conduct a classical symphony in the Gewandhaus, must have received an impression never to be forgotten. As composer his versatility and wealth of invention, even to the last, were astounding; he touched nearly every side of musical art, and did much noble work. His compositions, which sometimes show the influence of Mendelssohn and Schumann, but yet preserve their own individual character, are always written with a complete mastery of form. Many of them will live: amongst these must surely be reckoned his pianoforte pieces dedicated to young musicians (der musikalischen Jugend gewidmet), the children's songs, and the charming fairy-tale compositions.

His artistic successes did not alter the modesty of his personal requirements, and he was never more happy than in his family circle. Friends who were privileged to meet him at home, could always learn something from his conversation, from which a certain fine sense of humour was never missing. He was never tired of telling of his meetings with great artists: Schumann, Liszt, H. W. Ernst and Jenny Lind, among others. For Liszt, who always visited him when he came to Leipzig, as a man, he entertained the highest respect: he often remarked how much he regretted that he could not think so highly of him as a composer.

Reinecke had an unusual gift for the expression of humour in music, and nowhere is this more apparent than in his delightful children's operas, 'Glückskind und Pechvogel' (1883), 'Die Teufelchen auf der Himmelswiese' (1898), and 'Traumfriedel' (1906). Often also in the little performances in the home circle he would at a moment's notice improvise with rare art variations on the works of favourite composers.

To this happy side of his genius belongs the master's last work, Op. 286, the proofs of which were ready a few days before his death. It is composed to Hans Andersen's 'Fairy-tale of the Swineherd,' as a duet for pianoforte, and is dedicated to Queen Alexandra, of whose fondness for Andersen's fairy-tales he was aware. The work forms a sister composition to the music to Hoffmann's 'Märchen vom Nussknacker und Mausekönig' (written more than fifty years before), which helped to establish Reinecke's fame.

His last work will help to keep his name alive, and many who knew him will play it and remember its creator, and see him before them, a noble, kindly old man with silver locks and gentle eyes, whose heart was pure and simple as a child's, and whose motto was: 'Art should bring happiness to mankind!'

On August 22, the competition for the Rubinstein prize takes place at the St. Petersburg Conservatoire. The competition is open to all male artists from twenty to twenty-six years of age. The conditions are as follows: For composers: (a) A concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra; (b) A trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello; (c) Some smaller pianoforte pieces. (The compositions must be unpublished, and the composers must perform the pianoforte part of their own works.) For pianists: The first and second movements from Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, Op. 70, and a Prelude and four-part Fugue by Bach; an Andante or Adagio by Haydn or Mozart; one of Beethoven's Sonatas, Op. 78, 81, 90, 101, 106, 109, 110, 111; a Mazurka, Nocturne and Ballade by Chopin; or one or two numbers from Schumann's 'Fantasiestücke' or 'Kreisleriana'; and an Etude by Liszt. The prize is £200 in each case. Inquiries should be addressed to the Bureau of the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, before July 18.

As the result of the competition just held at Trinity College of Music, scholarships tenable for one year, with possible renewal thereof, have been awarded to: Sidney H. Sheppard, organ; Edith M. Davies and Lilian Goodson, singing; and Dorothy I. Meallin, violin. Free instruction has been awarded for one year to: John H. Silvester, double-bass; and Margaret E. Gibson, flute. The following candidates were highly commended: Leonard Gordon, Eric Hurst, Joseph Myers, Ruby L. M. Shepherd and Winifred D. Bianchi.

Church and Organ Music.

The Concerto in E flat by the Rev. William Felton (composer of the well-known chant in C minor) shows in a remarkable degree the influence of Handel, and is indeed at once an exact reproduction of the overture in the form which that master so often employed. There are four movements—viz., an introduction, a fugue, a pastoral movement (Alla Siciliana), and a piece in the gavotte style, though it actually lacks the rhythmic character of that dance. A vigorous and diatonic passage is stated, and with a contrasted theme forms the material of which the introduction consists:

A tempo ordinario. (Maestoso.) ♩ = 56.

The fugue is based on this promising subject:

The following is surely by Handel?

Very characteristic of the time is the 'Alla Siciliana,' which commences:

The whole movement is of great beauty, and would show off the flutes and oboes to great advantage. The connecting phrase next quoted was surely common property!

At all events, it leads, in the true Handelian manner, to the 'A tempo di Gavotta,' which enters thus:

With some alternating contrasted phrases, and an appearance of the first subject in the minor key, this graceful movement ends an unusually interesting piece which is certainly worth knowing.

A somewhat quaint example is the Introduction and Fugue in A, by Dr. Nares. Opening with a broad diatonic passage:

the movement develops through cadenzas and episodes of a straightforward character, leading up to the fugue by means of the following passage :

The fugue subject admits of some development, and is as follows :

An episode in which inversion of the subject is shown is worth quoting :

An effective pedal entry ff is made later, leading to the pedal point and conclusion.

The Adagio by John Bennett (? born 1735), who succeeded Dr. Burney as organist of St. Dionis Backchurch, E.C., is remarkable as an example of well distributed part-writing, and would serve admirably as an introductory voluntary. We quote the opening and concluding sections :

PASSIONTIDE SERVICES.

On Tuesday, March 22, the annual performance of Bach's Passion Music ('St. Matthew') took place in St. Paul's Cathedral, under the direction of Sir George Martin. The choir was, as usual on these occasions, supplemented, and there was a full orchestra, the organist being Mr. Charles Macpherson. The Cathedral was crowded long before the hour of service, and those privileged to gain admittance were impressed by a splendid rendering of Bach's great work.

A performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' was given in St. Alban's Cathedral on Tuesday, March 22, under the able direction of the organist, Mr. W. L. Luttman. The choir of the Cathedral was largely augmented, and the organ (skillfully played by Mr. Ley, of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford) was supplemented by two pianofortes and drums, the timpanist being Mr. G. G. Cleather. The soloists were Miss Viola Salvin and Mr. Campbell McInnes. The occasion was a notable one, and should prove of high value in the musical education of the district, while it certainly reflects the greatest credit upon the perseverance and energy of the cathedral organist.

The Glasgow Bach Choir's fine performance of the 'St. John' Passion (the first in the West of Scotland) took place in the cathedral on March 23. Great pains were taken to present the work as clearly as possible, and for this purpose the main body of the chorus representing the Jewish crowd, and the singers representing the characters in the sacred story, sang from the Lady Chapel; the reflective solo numbers were sung from the organ loft, the chorales from under the west window, and the narrative sections from the chancel. An orchestra and two organs (one specially erected for the occasion) were used, so that each group might be suitably accompanied. Mr. Webster Millar took the part of the narrator, and the other soloists were Misses Rana Taggart and E. Mackay, and Messrs. P. Malcolm, R. H. Malcolm, and Fred J. Taggart. Mr. H. Verbrugghen led the orchestra, and Messrs. Herbert Walton and W. F. Forsyth acted as organists. Mr. J. M. Diack, the conductor, is to be congratulated on a very notable performance.

On March 21, Mr. S. H. Nicholson (successor to Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne) gave portions of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion in the Cathedral. His forces were restricted to the ordinary choir, assisted by four extra singers, so, whilst one would cordially welcome this attempt, one may be permitted to express a hope that next Lent the 'Passion' may be sung with more adequate means. The congregation completely filled the building.

A special service of Passion music was held on the Tuesday in Holy Week at Emmanuel Church, West Hampstead, when part of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was sung by the choir to the accompaniment of strings and organ. The soloists were Messrs. Gordon Cooper and Charles W. Jones, and Mr. Foote presided at the organ. Mr. Harold Darke, the organist of the church, conducted.

Among notable services were the following: Lee Williams's 'Gethsemane,' at Cradley Parish Church, and the Wesleyan Church, Exmouth. Sir J. Stainer's 'The Crucifixion,' at St. Bede's Church, Liverpool; The British Embassy Church, Paris; Oakland's Congregational Church, Uxbridge Road, W.; Woodstock Church. Maunder's 'Olivet to Calvary,' at Harringay Congregational Church, and St. John's Church, Old Colwyn; and the same composer's 'Penitence, Pardon and Peace,' at Woolwich Congregational Church. Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' at St. Mary's, West Kensington. Bach's cantata 'Sleepers, wake!' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' at Troon Parish Church. Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' at the Congregational Church, Gosport. Gounod's 'Come unto Him' and 'O Divine Redeemer,' at Mount Pleasant Congregational Church, Tunbridge Wells. Gounod's 'Redemption,' at Chigwell Church, and at St. Giles's Church, Willenhall.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

At the Parish Church, Portsmouth, on Sunday, April 3, a musical service was held, at which several numbers from Haydn's 'The Creation' were sung. Mendelssohn's chorus 'Lord, Thou alone' ('St. Paul') and some organ solos were included in an interesting and impressive scheme. Mr. R. H. Turner, the organist and choirmaster of the church, had charge of the musical arrangements.

A special musical service was held in the Parish Church, Ash-next-Sandwich, on April 5. The chief works performed were Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and a selection from Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus.' The soloists were Madame Lily Jönsson (soprano) and Mr. G. de Orfe (tenor), who were heard to great advantage in the solos allotted to them and who gave a most expressive rendering of the duet 'Love divine.' Miss Hylde Bruce Payne played two violin solos very effectively. The choir was well balanced and did excellent work, indicating the careful training they had received at the hands of their conductor, Mr. J. A. Bailey, who presided at the organ.

On April 6 a recital of Haydn's 'Spring' was given by the Musical Association of St. Philip's United Free Church, Portobello, Mr. Arthur E. Little conducting. The performance was most enjoyable, both soloists and choir having entered heartily into the spirit of the work. Dr. W. B. Ross officiated as accompanist, and contributed a couple of organ solos.

In Wesley's Chapel, City Road, on April 11, the ninth annual festival service of the London Wesleyan Methodist Choir Union was held. The Magnificat was sung to Sir J. Stainer's setting in B flat, and the anthem was Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' the service concluding with Stainer's Sevenfold Amen. Mr. A. Furse conducted, and Mr. C. F. Warner was the organist.

On Wednesday, April 20, Bennett's 'The Woman of Samaria' was given in Durham Cathedral as the ninth of the series of oratorio services instituted by the Rev. Minor Canon A. D. Culley, organist and precentor. The soprano solos (usually allotted to the choristers) were taken by Madame Lilian Inglis, and the remainder of the solo work by members of the cathedral choir. There was a small orchestra of strings, and the organ part was supplied by Mr. W. Ellis, assistant-organist of the cathedral.

An interesting organ recital was given at St. Paul's Church, Covent Garden, on March 12, in commemoration of the bicentenary of Dr. Arne. Mr. Harry E. Wall was the organist, and with the assistance of Messrs. Bryant and Trytel (violins) and Master Leslie Dunn (London College for Choristers) succeeded in giving an excellent performance of a programme consisting entirely of Dr. Arne's works, which we subjoin:

1. (a) Overture } 'Comus.
- (b) Air .. }
2. (a) Siciliano } from the Harpsichord Lessons.
- (b) Gavotte }
- (Arranged for organ by EDMONDSTOUNE DUNCAN.)
3. Vocal solo 'How cheerily along the gay mead.'
 ('Death of Abel.')
4. Con Spirito from an Organ Concerto.
5. Sonata in E minor for two Violins and Organ.
1. Siciliano. 2. Moderato. 3. Largo. 4. Allegro.
6. (a) Air from 'Artaxerxes.'
- (b) March from 'Judith.'

The balance sheet of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, which was submitted to the general meeting held in the Town Hall on March 21, the Lord Bishop presiding, showed a gratifying increase in the sale of tickets at the ninth festival last November, and a decrease in expenditure, the net result being a profit of £30. It was however pointed out that without the annual subscribers the result would have been different, and a strong appeal was made for continued public support. It is intended again to invite works by local composers to be sent in for consideration and possible performance at the next festival.

During the month, recitals by the following Church Musical Associations in Edinburgh have been given:—In Queen Street United Free Church (Spohr's 'God, Thou art great' and Gade's 'Zion'); Roseburn United Free Church (Mauder's 'Song of thanksgiving,' &c.); Davidson United Free Church, Eyre Place (Bach's 'God so loved the world' and Mendelssohn's 'Come let us sing'); North Morningside United Free Church (Stainer's 'St. Mary Magdalen,' &c.); Craigmillar United Free Church (Gounod's 'Out of darkness' and Elgar's Te Deum and Benedictus); West Coates Parish Church (Stainer's 'Crucifixion'); Christ Church, Morning-side (Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle,' with full orchestral and organ accompaniment).

The Council of the Royal College of Organists have arranged for a series of lectures to be given at the College, on the 'Art of teaching the various subjects included in a scheme of general musical education.' The first lecture will be given by Professor Sir Walter Parratt, M.V.O., on Monday evening, May 9, at 8 p.m.

Dr. Keeton, organist of Peterborough Cathedral, has completed forty years' tenure of office, having served under Bishops Magee, Creighton and Carr-Glynn.

VIOLIN AND PIANOFORTE.

Old English Violin Music. Edited by Alfred Moffat: No. 8, Trio-Sonata in D minor, by William Boyce; No. 10, Sonata in E major, by Charles Macklean; No. 11, Sonata in G minor, by William Croft; No. 12, Sonata in D minor, by Joseph Gibbs; No. 13, Sonata in D minor, by John Humphries; No. 14, Sonata in A minor, by Thomas Vincent.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Several interesting numbers have been recently added to the unique collection of 'Old English Violin Music,' edited by Alfred Moffat. The series is rapidly assuming the nature of a national monument to the talents of our well-nigh forgotten British composers of the 17th and 18th centuries.

No. 8 consists of a Trio-Sonata in D minor for two violins and pianoforte, with violoncello ad lib., by Dr. William Boyce (1710-79), whose Three Pieces for violin and pianoforte (No. 9 of this edition) were recently reviewed in these pages. The present work consists of a richly conceived Andante followed by a fine Fuga, and concludes with a short, crisp movement in the form of a Gigue. As the violoncello part, even in the Fuga, merely duplicates the bass of the pianoforte, the Trio can be recommended as a welcome addition to the somewhat limited repertory of effective works for two violins and pianoforte.

No. 10 is a Sonata in E, by Charles Macklean, who was probably a Scottish violinist of the first half of the 18th century; but authentic details of the composer's life are lacking. A short Largo is followed by an Allegro con spirito; then an Andante precedes the inevitable Gigue for a Finale. Tunefulness and good violin writing characterise the Sonata throughout.

No. 11 is a Sonata in G minor, by Dr. William Croft (1678-1727). This is one of a set of six sonatas published in 1700—when Croft was only a little over twenty years of age—the title-page of which states the curious fact that they were 'composed' by Mr. Wm. Crofts and an Italian Mr. London.' We know not who the 'Italian Mr.' may have been, but anyhow this particular sonata was the work of Croft (he sometimes spelt his name with an s), and a fine composition it is, too; giving, indeed, full evidence of the genuine musical genius of this country when our composers were under the direct national inspiration derived from the immortal Purcell, and before—as the editor remarks in his preface—our ‘fine old English School had been practically strangled (we would rather say ‘blighted’) by the pernicious influence of Handel.’

No. 12 is a Sonata in D minor, by Joseph Gibbs (1699-1788). Who among our violinists ever heard of him? And yet we venture to think that those who once play this exceptionally fine work—so far, we should say, the most difficult of the series—will not be likely to let it drop out of their repertory of concert pieces. It has three movements: an Adagio, giving full scope for fine expressive playing, with effective chord and arpeggio passages, is followed by an Allemande of quite an original turn; and then, preceded by a short Largo, quasi Recit., comes a delightful Air con variazione in D major. The Variations show much ingenuity in their treatment, and are quite different in style from the old-fashioned ‘Doubles’ of Handel’s suites. The sonata is well-worthy of a public hearing.

No. 13 is another Sonata in D minor, this time by John Humphries (1707-30), a composer who, according to Sir John Hawkins, was a ‘young man of promising parts and a good performer on the violin.’ His early death, however, cut short the promise of his youth. The sonata (Adagio, Allemanda, Sarabanda and Giga) shows clear evidence of ability, and is deserving of resuscitation.

No. 14—the last, so far, of the series, which is to be continued—is a Sonata in A minor, by Thomas Vincent, a member of a musical family of the 18th century. The three movements (Adagio, Allegro con spirito and Largo-Allegretto) are admirably written for the solo instrument, and are particularly pleasing and melodious.

We have on previous occasions given unstinted praise to Mr. Moffat for his work in editing this series, and the same experience and skill are in evidence throughout the present numbers.

Mutterhertz. Bekenntnis. Du am Abend. Der Liebe Leichenzug. Lieber Regen. With German and English words. Music composed by Wilhelm Kienz. [Ed. Bote & G. Bock, Berlin.]

There is abundant evidence of artistic taste and endeavour in this group of songs. The musical ideas emerge, with occasional backslidings, from the common rut, and are often truthfully expressive of the meaning of the words. The accompaniments are free from conventional formula, and are harmonized with some insight. Some portentous passages occur in the gloomy but significant ‘Der Liebe Leichenzug,’ ‘Lieber Regen’ has a pretty, descriptive accompaniment, and ‘Du am Abend’ a very effective ending. Taken as a whole, these songs are attractive music; but, although bearing the Opus number 81, they show traces of what resembles inexperience; they are not music of the class in which grammatical errors are considered effective.

Silence prevailed in Heaven. Richard Dering.
God, That maddest earth and heaven. Thomas Attwood.
The souls of the righteous. Sir John Goss.

[Bosworth & Co.]

The anthem by Dering is a fine example of the composer’s method, and in many places anticipates the style and harmony of Purcell. It should find a place in our anthem lists. Attwood’s anthem (composed in 1827 for The Harmonicon) will appeal to those who demand simplicity and directness, and should therefore become popular in our village churches. Also written for The Harmonicon in 1827, Sir John Goss’s music will be found well suited to the solemn words, and to the occasions which would call for its use. Sir Frederick Bridge is responsible for the work of editing and adapting, and it need not be said how well he has accomplished his work.

Ballade for the Organ. By Arthur W. Pollitt, D.Mus. [Stainer & Bell, Ltd.]

Dr. Pollitt has produced a charming piece in a style combining modern thought and treatment of the instrument with sound musicianship. He evidently ‘thinks polyphonically,’ and has so expressed himself. The pedal-part is not a series of supports for the left foot (alas, too common in modern organ pieces), but is throughout interesting and independent. We think the middle section very attractive and well developed, and we await further specimens of Dr. Pollitt’s work with interest.

BEETHOVEN’S MASS IN D. A FACT NOT GENERALLY KNOWN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ‘MUSICAL TIMES.’

DEAR SIR,—I have just returned from Frankfort, where I attended a performance (a very good one, be it noted) of the above work. I noticed that the whole of the Sanctus down to the orchestral prelude to the Benedictus was sung by the solo quartet. On referring to four editions of the score (including the first one), I find that this is strictly correct; and though it is certainly true that the fugal section ‘Pleni sunt coeli,’ &c., and the following ‘Osanna’ sound very thin with only one voice to a part on account of the complicated and florid accompaniment, still the composer has clearly written ‘solo’ to each of the voice parts. Now in Novello’s edition these movements are indicated to be sung by the full chorus. It is certain that this procedure is a gain, but no information is given either by preface or otherwise as to who originated the practice of thus performing the work. Perhaps some readers of the Musical Times can supply the required information.

I ought to mention that a first-class violinist (Mr. Henri Marteau) was engaged to play the solo violin in the Benedictus, and that he stood in front, next to the solo singers and played this movement like a Concerto.

Yours truly,

HARRY A. KEYSER.

BUILDINGS FOR MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ‘MUSICAL TIMES.’

SIR,—I have only just seen your review of my book on the organ. I quite agree that my idea as to the use of solo reeds to bring out points in a fugue or other composition is open to argument, but I would remark that I specially said it was a source of effect to be used with great caution and reticence. But in questioning my opinion as to the nature of the materials to be used in buildings for music (and more especially for organ-music) I think, if you will excuse my saying so, that you are going a little beyond your métier. I am an architect, and have given special attention to the effect of materials on sound in buildings.

What is wanted in the interior of a concert hall is a class of material which will sympathise and vibrate with sound, without either absorbing or reflecting it. Upholstery, to any great extent, is bad, because it absorbs sound without assisting it. On the other hand, all hard polished surfaces cause sharp echoes which are disturbing in their effect, especially to the large sounds of the organ. And generally speaking it may be said that whatever surface reflects light sharply will reflect sound sharply, thereby producing echo. The best interior lining, so far as experience shows, is fibrous plaster, perhaps combined with a wood dado.

At St. George's Hall, Liverpool, where all the interior surfaces are marble and hard cement, the echo set up is such that a full organ fugue becomes absolutely confused. When I heard Best give a recital at the City Temple (where there is very little echo) to re-open the enlarged organ, I told him afterwards that I had never before realised the brilliancy of his execution in rapid pedal-passages, because I had only before heard him at St. George's Hall, where, in consequence of the echo, nothing is heard of them but a confused rumble—all the notes run into one another by the echo.

It is many years since I heard organ playing at King's College Chapel, and I cannot remember my impression; but if the building has the prolonging echoes described in Wordsworth's sonnet—and, from its construction, it certainly ought to have them—I should say that it must be a very bad building for anything like elaborate organ-music. For slow music in massed harmonies no doubt the echo is fine, and adds something to the effect; but that is quite a different matter from clearness of definition in music in quick tempo and of elaborate design.

Yours faithfully,

H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM.

Wimbledon, March 21.

Obituary.

M. EDOUARD COLONNE.

With much regret we have to record that the well-spent life of this distinguished French conductor came to an end in Paris on March 28. Last year he was afflicted with paralysis in one arm, and was unable to conduct the famous Châtelet Concerts which crowned his arduous and useful career.

Colonne was born at Bordeaux on July 23, 1838, and was thus nearly seventy-two years of age at the time of his death. He came of a musical family, and soon manifested uncommon faculty.

In 1855 he went to Paris, and studied the violin under Girard and Sauzey and composition under Ambroise Thomas. He became first violin at the Opera in 1858, and a few years later he was connected with the Pásdeloup orchestra formed for the 'Concerts Populaires.' In 1873, after the war, Colonne started an orchestra, which he himself conducted, and it was then that he began to make his world-wide reputation.

M. Colonne became a great apostle of Berlioz, and he did not omit to give his support to many others of the French School. César Franck, Saint-Saëns, Bizet, d'Indy, Massenet, and others, were all brought into prominence, and Tchaikovsky's works were frequently in his programmes. Londoners, too, on several occasions, enjoyed the benefit of hearing his fine interpretations of orchestral masterpieces. It will be remembered that a year or more ago M. Colonne conducted at a number of Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts during the absence of Mr. Henry J. Wood.

We regret to record the death of Mr. HENRY JOSEPH LOVEDAY, which took place at his residence at Strawberry Hill on March 29, in his seventy-second year. Mr. Loveday was a member of a musical family, and was himself an accomplished musician. He was one of the first violins in the orchestra of the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, and was subsequently appointed Musical Director at the Alexandra Theatre, Liverpool. Mr. Loveday was, however, best known through his association with Sir Henry Irving, to whose service he devoted the best years of his life as stage manager. He held this important appointment from 1877 until the death of the distinguished actor in 1905. During this period his invaluable assistance contributed in no small degree to the many successful productions at the Lyceum Theatre.

We regret also to record the following deaths:

MR. JOHN PARDEW, which occurred suddenly at Plymouth on April 13, and has caused great sorrow throughout Devon and Cornwall. He was widely known in south-west England for his abilities as an organist, pianist, violinist, conductor and teacher, and his personal qualities gained him many friends. He was born in 1855, and quickly developed his musical faculties. At the age of sixteen he received the appointment of organist of St. Michael's, Stoke. Subsequently he conducted choral societies at Devonport and in the neighbourhood, and succeeded Mr. F. N. Lohr as conductor of the Plymouth Vocal Association. He also became leader of the Devon County Musical Association. His last appointment was as organist of Emmanuel Church, Mannamoad. He was untiring and enthusiastic in his influential activity, and his place will be hard to fill.

MR. ARTHUR DIXON HOLLOWAY, of St. Ives, Hunts, on April 2, aged seventy-eight years. Born at Wallington in 1832, he developed musical abilities at an early age. He was educated at and later became Precentor of St. Mark's College, Chelsea. Mr. Holloway was appointed organist of St. Ives Parish Church in 1854, which position he retained for thirty-five years.

SIGNOR GIOVANNI BATTISTE LAMPERTI (the younger), the famous singing-master, on March 18, at Berlin, in his seventy-first year. He was one of the foremost apostles of the art of the 'bel canto,' and numbered among his pupils Mesdames Schumann-Heinck and Marcella Sembrich.

LOUIS NUNCZY, a famous Hungarian violinist of the national type. He died at Budapest on April 18. He exercised great fascination over his countrymen, and is said to have left a large fortune.

HERR ALBERT ZABEL, one of the first harpists of the age, and a successful composer for his instrument, at St. Petersburg recently.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

M. Sergius Kusnezitzky conducted the concert given on April 4, and opportunity was taken to introduce an important work, new to England, by one of the most advanced of living Russian composers, A. N. Scriabine. 'Le poème de l'extase' was published in 1908, and bears the Opus number 54. The programme of this remarkable work may be roughly described as the quest and ultimate finding of 'the joy of untrammelled activity' in some intangible higher sense. In a lower and more material sense it was well-illustrated in the harmonies and orchestration, which were decidedly free from trammels in their more active moments. The most modern style of expression is maintained with aggressive insistence and with greater mastery of colour than of outline. The work created a powerful impression, but no great demand for a second hearing. In the latter respect it differed from an orchestrated version, made by M. Steinberg, of a concerto in D by Philipp Emanuel Bach. Beethoven's 'Egmont' overture and Symphony No. 8 completed the programme.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The presence of Dr. Richard Strauss as chief conductor of the concert given on April 9, inspired the Queen's Hall Orchestra to a display of their best form, and the brilliance and responsiveness of their playing helped to make the occasion memorable. The chief work in the programme was Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony. If any demonstration were needed that Strauss's professed love for the music of Mozart is no mere pose, it was given by this performance. His reading was individual in its enlightened appreciation of the music, and created the strongest impression of the concert, in spite of the fact that two of his own compositions were in the programme. These were the early and familiar tone-poems 'Don Juan' and 'Tod und Verklärung,' of which it was interesting to hear authoritative interpretations. The composer employed less rubato than other conductors who have essayed the works in recent years, and emphasised the beauty of his ideas where some have dwelt more upon their originality. The remaining number on the programme was Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, finely played by M. Zimbalist with the orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wood.

The annual Endowment Fund concert took place on April 12, under Mr. Wood's direction. A familiar programme was given, in which Miss Ada Crossley took part.

THE HAGUE ORCHESTRA.

'Het Residentie Orkest' of The Hague, by whom a concert was given at Queen's Hall on April 6, came with a high reputation that had recently been enhanced by a special tribute from Strauss. They exhibited soundness rather than brilliance. The strings had a sonority that was more sweet than rich, and the wind-playing had more of precision than subtlety. A noteworthy point was the clear and firm articulation of the double-basses in rapid work. The orchestra as a whole played with excellent unity. Dr. Henri Viotta, the conductor, had a firm beat, and showed great ability and experience, if little personal magnetism. The concert spoke well for Dutch musical ability, but gave no shock to our national vanity. The programme consisted of Bach's third 'Brandenburg' concerto for strings; Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, of which the solo part was played by Miss May Harrison; Beethoven's fifth Symphony; Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung'; the Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan,' and a recitative and aria from 'Iphigénie auf Tauris,' by Ch. Coster. Madame Léonie Viotta, the vocalist, showed considerable natural gifts, but the excerpt in which she chose to exhibit them was hardly worthy of the occasion. A large and enthusiastic audience was present.

THE EDWARD MASON CHOIR.

The indebtedness of the British composer to Mr. Edward Mason and his choir, already considerable, was greatly increased on April 6, when this generous body of singers gave their concert at Queen's Hall. With noble devotion they confined their whole attention to music of British origin, gave to two works their first public hearing, and to two others their first performance in London. The last-mentioned were Dr. Brewer's agreeable ballad—for baritone, chorus, and orchestra—'Sir Patrick Spens,' produced at a Cardiff festival, and Mr. Nicholas Gatty's more ambitious setting of Milton's 'Fly, envious time,' produced at a Sheffield festival. The absolute novelties were both well received. The first was Mr. W. H. Speer's setting of the Ingoldsby Legend 'The Lay of St. Cuthbert,' for chorus and orchestra. The poem is a long one, and not of a character that demands or usually gains by the addition of music, but Mr. Speer's treatment of it had both musicianship and moments of clever invention. The remaining novelty was the most enjoyable feature of the concert. It was a short orchestral piece entitled 'A Somerset Rhapsody,' written by Mr. Gustav von Holst, upon the basis of tunes that were thoroughly charming whatever their source. His use of the themes was ingenious, and the scoring tasteful and effective. The programme was completed with two songs by Sir Charles Stanford, sung by Miss Viola Tree, and Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon' choral Suite. The baritone soloist was Mr. William Higley.

'THE DREAM OF GERONTIUS' AT RUGBY AND SOUTHPORT.

Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' was performed for the first time in Rugby by the Philharmonic Society, in the Temple Speech Room, on March 31. The event had been looked forward to with keen anticipation, which was amply justified by the success of the performance. It was evident that the choir and orchestra had been fully impressed with the devotional atmosphere of the work. The admirable quality of the voices, the varied expression displayed by the choir, and the efficient rendering of the orchestral effects indicated the care and enthusiasm with which the oratorio had been rehearsed under the able conductor, Mr. Basil Johnson, who had complete and effective control over all his forces. The names of the solo artists, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. Daniel Price, are sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the solo work. The appreciation of the Society for the enthusiastic efforts of Mr. Johnson (who has been for many years Musical Director at Rugby School and conductor of the Philharmonic Society) was marked by their presentation to him at the previous evening's rehearsal of a handsome antique oak music-cabinet and an armchair.

The Southport and Birkdale Philharmonic Society closed their season, on April 12, with a performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius.' Under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Speed, the reputation this fine choir has achieved in previous performances of this work was fully upheld, although on this occasion their numbers were sadly depleted by the influenza fiend. No less than eight of the tenors were unavoidably absent from this cause. Mr. Speed has not only imbued himself with the spirit of the oratorio, but has manifestly imparted it to the singers, who sang with remarkable delicacy in the softer passages, and with force and vigour elsewhere, notably in the Demon chorus. It was in all respects a fine choral performance, with which Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Coates and Mr. Montague Borwell were worthily associated in the vocal solos. The band was composed of members of the Hallé Orchestra.

London Concerts.

GOOD FRIDAY CONCERTS.

Musical activity of the usual character was exhibited on Good Friday, March 25, and the custom of attending sacred concerts on that day showed no diminution in popularity. An enormous audience gathered at the Crystal Palace where, in the afternoon, Madame Agnes Nicholls, Madame Clara Butt, Madame Edna Thornton, Mr. Charles Saunders, Mr. Kennerley Rumford and Sir Charles Santley, assisted by the Crystal Palace Choir, the Crystal Palace Military Band and the London Symphony Orchestra, directed by Mr. Walter W. Hedgecock, carried out a popular programme, parts of which could scarcely have been avoided. Madame Butt was the leading attraction at a sacred ballad concert given in the evening at Queen's Hall. The programme of the afternoon concert given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Mr. Wood's direction, included, as usual, Tchaikovsky's sixth Symphony. At the Alexandra Palace two concerts took place: in the afternoon the Royal Artillery Band attracted a large audience, and in the evening a still larger audience listened to a performance of 'The Messiah' by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, under Mr. Allen Gill. 'The Messiah' was also given at the Albert Hall by the Royal Choral Society, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge. The People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Society also gave an excellent performance of 'The Messiah' on Good Friday, under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Idle. The Walthamstow Choral Union, conducted by Mr. John Evans, gave Gounod's 'Redemption' at the Walthamstow Palace.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music is, happily, frequently employed as a church service. In former times it was often undertaken by choral societies for the purposes of concert-giving, but lately the custom has fallen into disuse, and probably the performance given on April 14 by the London Choral Society enabled many to make their first acquaintance with this great work. Mr. Fagge eschewed all editions and revised versions, and confined himself to Bach's original score. His tendency to employ a rather dramatic and emotional style in the singing of the chorales was open to objection, but was certainly more permissible in the concert-room than it would be in the church. The choral singing maintained the advanced standard recently shown by this Society, and the solo work was efficiently done by Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Effie Martyn, Messrs. Radford, Heather, Ranalow, David Evans, and John Prout.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The ambition that characterizes the doings of the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society and the Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society, was much in evidence at the concerts given by them on April 11 and April 14 respectively. Under Mr. Allen Gill's inspiring direction, the former body gave excellent readings of Parry's 'Symphonic variations,' Ambroise Thomas's 'Mignon' overture and the accompaniment to Tchaikovsky's first Pianoforte concerto, in which the pianist was Mr. Percy Grainger. The choir gave part-songs and madrigals under the direction of Mr. Munro Davison, and Miss Edith Evans sang. The Strolling Players, under Mr. Joseph Ivey, played Nicodé's seldom-heard 'Symphonic variations,' the overtures to Gluck's 'Iphigénie en Aulide' and Humperdinck's 'Hänsel und Gretel,' and accompanied Miss Marjorie Haydon in Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto. Mr. Campbell McInnes was the vocalist of the occasion.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Beethoven's Trio in D major (Op. 70) and Camille Chevillard's Trio in F major were admirably played by the London Trio at Æolian Hall on April 5. An interesting selection of songs was sung by Miss Lily Crawforth.

The last concert of the Sunderland-Thistleton series took place at Steinway Hall on April 14. The instrumental portion of the programme comprised works by Purcell, J. S. Bach, Locatelli, Couperin and John Hebdon, who was represented by a concerto for two oboi, string quintet and harpsichord. The excellence of both the music and its performance, in which Miss Sunderland, Mr. Thistleton, and other capable artists took part, was typical of the judgment, sincerity and ability of the organizers. Vocal numbers were given by Mr. Wilfred Douthitt.

The centenary spirit is by no means exhausted after its recent energy, and is now active in connection with the hundredth anniversary of Schumann's birth. The Classical Concert Society have devoted three concerts to the celebration of the centenary of the great 'Romantic'—a word which used to signify 'Anti-classical'—composer. Opportunity was rightly taken to revive some of his less familiar works, such as the Andante and Variations in B flat major for two pianofortes, two violoncellos and horn. A number of well-known artists, including pupils of Madame Clara Schumann, took part in the concerts, of which the first and second were given on April 13 and 20, and the third promised for April 27.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

On Tuesday, April 5, Mr. Ernest Schelling gave the first of two recitals at Queen's Hall. His programme included Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, Op. 57 (Appassionata), and Schumann's 'Carneval,' as well as works by Mendelssohn, Brahms, and Liszt. The artist's rendering of Beethoven's Sonata, though technically very good, was somewhat marred by a tendency towards sentimentality, but he played Schumann's 'Carneval' with a fine sense of its poetry. Mr. Schelling, who particularly excels in the production of 'elegant' effects, played some Liszt Transcriptions, and two of his own compositions, most delightfully. His second recital, which took place on April 12, at the same hall, was devoted to compositions by Chopin. This master's music suits Mr. Schelling's individuality to perfection, and he showed his pianistic and musical powers in their most favourable light in the Sonata in B minor, Op. 58, and the two Ballads in F minor and A flat major.

At Miss Edith Walton's second recital, which she carried out with well-deserved success at Bechstein Hall on April 11, the programme included Moriz Rosenthal's 'Variations on an original theme' for pianoforte.—The pupils of Miss Minnie S. Crouch gave an interesting programme of pianoforte works at Steinway Hall on April 13.

The first of Mr. Richard Buhlig's two extra recitals took place at Steinway Hall on April 15. He submitted an interesting programme of works by César Franck and Debussy, including the first-named master's Prelude, Choral, and Fugue, and the latter's 'Hommage à Rameau,' 'Poissons d'or,' 'Reflets dans l'eau,' &c. Mr. Buhlig, who throughout the recital played very well, seemed more in sympathy with the serene dignity of César Franck's compositions than with the airy grace of Debussy's music, which he often treated somewhat too massively. At the same time his reading of Debussy was occasionally remarkable for beautiful effects of tone-colour.

On Saturday, April 16, the pianist Mlle. Mania Seguel made her reappearance at Queen's Hall. Assisted by Mr. Landon Ronald and the New Symphony Orchestra, Mlle. Seguel, who possesses a pretty touch and neat execution, was heard to advantage in Mozart's Concerto in A major (Köchel, No. 448). She was at times very good in Tchaikovsky's second Concerto in G major, Op. 44, though taken as a whole her style seemed hardly big enough for this difficult work. Miss Ida Kahn contributed vocal solos.—Mr. Frank Merrick chose an unusually interesting programme for his recital at Bechstein Hall on April 18. Commencing with William Byrd's variations on 'John, come kisse me now,' from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, he later gave a fine performance (the first in London) of Max Reger's most interesting Variations (Op. 81) on a theme from J. S. Bach's cantata 'Auf Christi Himmelfahrt.' The work is conceived on the very largest scale, and in common with most of Reger's compositions is full of harmonic and contrapuntal devices, which culminate in a fugue of astounding complexity. The work bristles with technical difficulties; even when these have been overcome it still remains a test of physical endurance. Mr. Merrick also played Schumann's Toccata, Chopin's rarely-heard 'Allegro de Concert,' and compositions by Beachcroft, Balfour Gardiner ('Christmas greeting, 1908'), and Debussy, whose 'Doll's serenade' was executed most gracefully. The recital-giver was assisted by Mr. Kennerley Rumford, who sang Brahms's 'Four serious Songs.'

VOCAL RECITALS.

Two recitals of unusual interest were given at Bechstein Hall on March 21 and April 9, by Mr. John Coates. For the former he chose the extremely varied and exacting programme of English, French, and German songs, old and new, with which he recently obtained a great success in Berlin, Hamburg and Bremen. The second programme was entirely English. To do justice to these occasions the audience should have been large as well as appreciative; the singular fatality by which both recitals were overshadowed by events of commanding importance in a neighbouring hall has been freely commented upon.

Madame Nina Menzies, in giving a recital at Queen's Hall on April 7, again had the assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald.—Miss Emily Breare was the vocalist at the Chappell Matinée recital given at Æolian Hall on April 14, and carried out an interesting programme with ability and success. Her fellow-artist was Miss Effie Kalisz, the twelve-year old pianist.—A vocal recital was given by Madame Poldowski and Mr. Edward Ramsay at Seaford House on April 14, at which the former sang and accompanied some songs of her own composition.

An exacting list of songs made up the programme of the recital given at Bechstein Hall on April 19 by that admirable artist, Madame Ida Reman. Her interpretations were, as usual, significant and convincing; some of the most successful were in lighter vein.

Miss Grace Eisler (pianist) and Mr. Denis Byndon-Ayres (vocalist) gave a joint recital at the Æolian Hall on April 12. Miss Eisler, who on this occasion made her first appearance before a London audience, proved herself a technically well-equipped player. Her selection included Beethoven's Sonata quasi una fantasia in E flat (Op. 27, No. 1), the 'Papillons' by Schumann, and pieces by Scarlatti, Scgambati, Liszt, and her master Leschetizky. Mr. Byndon-Ayres, whose choice of programme was much to be commended on account of its unconventionality, sang Henschel's eight songs from the 'Trompeter von Sakkingen,' very impressively. He also presented a number of songs by contemporary British composers, including Elgar's 'The Torch,' Frederic Austin's 'My Susan,' and Granville Bantock's setting of William Blake's 'Love's secret,' all of which he sang with much artistic conviction.

Great success attended the first appearance in London, at Bechstein Hall, on April 14, of Miss Margarita Allardye Witt, a young and highly-promising violinist. —A recital was given at Æolian Hall on April 15, by Miss Adèle Rosenthal (violinist) and Miss Eveline Thompson (pianist). Both artists showed musical understanding and clever technique. Miss Rosenthal played Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' accompanied by Mr. Charlton Keith, and Miss Thompson played Brahms's F minor Sonata. Their spirited methods were well matched in Grieg's F major Sonata for violin and pianoforte, which they played together.

On April 20, Messrs. Eugene Ysayé and Raoul Pugno gave the first of three recitals devoted to Beethoven's Sonatas for violin and pianoforte, at Queen's Hall. Once again these artists excited the greatest admiration, not only on account of their individual excellence but by reason of their well-nigh perfect ensemble. The programme contained the three Sonatas Op. 12, and the 'Kreutzer Sonata,' Op. 47.

A successful concert was given at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on April 11, in aid of the Bishop of London's Fund. The names of the artists who assisted were a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the performance, and included Miss Evangeline Florence, Mr. Charles Phillips and the Madrigal Quartet (vocalists), Miss Ethel Barns (violinist), Mr. Herbert Fryer (pianist) and Mr. Charles Fry, who recited 'The building of San Sofia,' to music composed by H. M. Higgs, played on the organ by Mr. Edward G. Croager.

The Great Western Railway Musical Society brought their season to a close by a choral and orchestral concert in the shareholders' meeting room, Paddington Station, on April 14. The programme included Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' and Haydn's Symphony No. 2. Miss Winifred Marwood, Miss Ethel Archer, Mr. Henry Turnpenney and Mr. Montague Borwell were the solo vocalists. Mr. Reginald Hughes ably accompanied, and Mr. Henry A. Hughes conducted.

Suburban Concerts.

The Ealing Choral and Orchestral Society performed Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' and Stanford's 'The last post' at the Town Hall, on April 5. The choir sang with precision and good expression, and the orchestra (in addition to rendering a good account of the difficult accompaniments to the works named) gave a very spirited performance of Schubert's 'Rosamunde' overture. Miss Jenny Taggart, Mr. Ernest Pike and Mr. Edgar Coyle were the solo vocalists. Mr. Albert Thompson conducted skilfully.

A selection from Gounod's 'Faust' was performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society on April 9, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill. This was a light task for a choir of such capabilities, and they carried it out to the great enjoyment of a vast audience. The soloists were Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Maud Wright and Messrs. Harold Wilde, George Uttley and Robert Radford.

Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' was performed by the Twickenham Philharmonic Society on April 13, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Cowen, who may be congratulated on the success of the performance by both choir and orchestra. Miss Fanny Wood, Mr. James Davis and Mr. Jackson Potter were the solo vocalists. Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' overture and Rosse's incidental music to the 'Merchant of Venice' were included in the programme.

An excellent performance of the 'Hymn of Praise' was given by the East Finchley and Muswell Hill Musical Society in the New Lecture Hall, East Finchley, on April 14, under their conductor, Mr. George R. Ceiley. The solo vocalists were Miss Pauline Allen, Miss Edith Nutter and Mr. Ernest Pike. A very efficient orchestra contributed greatly to the success of the concert.

A performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' was given by the Lewisham Choral Society in the Blackheath Concert Hall on April 14, under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle. The singing of the choir was consistently good throughout. The soloists were Madame Mary Conly, Miss Mildred Guthrie, Miss Margaret Lewys, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The accompaniments were played by a full professional orchestra led by Mr. George Wilby.

The Staines Choral Society gave a performance of 'Elijah' at the Town Hall, on April 15, which reflected credit on the Society and its conductor, Mr. James Brown. The principal solo vocalists were Miss Florence Donovan, Miss Emilie Owen, Mr. Herbert Thompson and Mr. John Proust.

The second concert of the Stroud Green Choral Association took place in Hanley Hall on April 18, when Hiawatha's 'Wedding-feast' and the 'Death of Minnehaha' and the 'Old Sea Chanties' by J. Bradford and Arthur Fagge were performed, under the able conductorship of Mr. H. J. Timothy. The solo parts were sung by Miss Margaret Yorke and Mr. Herbert Emlin; Mr. Reginald Walter also assisted.

Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' was performed at Woodside Hall, Woodside Park, on April 19. The soloist was Mr. Henry Turnpenney. The programme included two part-songs, 'The Vikings' and 'Lullaby of life,' and the bridal chorus from the 'Rose maiden,' which were well sung by the choir. Mr. George Hooper conducted.

The Richmond Philharmonic Society gave a concert at the Castle Assembly Rooms on April 19, when the third act of 'Tannhäuser' and Bath's 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean' were the principal features of the programme, which also included Sibelius's symphonic-poem 'Finlandia.' The solo vocalists were Miss Oswyn Jones, Mr. James Davis and Mr. Stewart Gardner. Dr. Charles E. Jolley conducted.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, April 15, 1910.

On April 11, the Imperial Court Opera produced a new opera, 'Der Musikant,' by Julius Bittner, the industrious librettist and composer who two years ago gave evidence of his talent with the production of 'Die rote Gred.' Bittner in his new opera deals with a love story, which takes place in a count's private band towards the end of the eighteenth century. He introduces lively and dramatic scenes, and many humorous details. The music rests on the foundation of the modern tone-drama. It is spirited and characteristic, but lacking in strong melodic invention. The work was excellently performed and enthusiastically received by the public.

The tenor (Herr Miller) has been singing here frequently, and the baritone (Herr Hofbauer) has appeared with much success. Next autumn both artists will join the regular company of the Court Opera.

The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde has given a concert in memory of the late Burgomaster Dr. Lueger, at which Mozart's 'Requiem' was performed under the musical direction of Herr Schalk. The solos were sung by Frau Elizza, Fräulein Kittel, and Messrs. Maikl and Betetto, all members of the Court Opera. The Society gave a similar memorial concert to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Hugo Wolf. At the last choral concert of the Musikverein, Bach's 'Johannespassion' was given, the solo vocalists being Mesdames Senius-Erler and Schuenemann, and Messrs. Senius and Raatz-Brockmann. A charity matinée, originated by the generous Duchess Metternich-Sandor, had an extraordinary success owing to the originality of the programme, and the assistance of artists of the first rank. The Philharmonic Orchestra, the Männergesangverein, and a number of the most famous instrumental and vocal soloists, combined to give a concert of vocal and instrumental dance music. The waltzes and choruses by Johann Strauss, perfectly performed, were the great success of the evening. The Konzertverein and Tonkünstlerorchester have ended their series of concerts, and the season is slowly drawing to a close.

Music in the Provinces.

BIRMINGHAM.

On March 22, the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra gave, at the Town Hall, an orchestral concert of more than ordinary interest, having secured for that occasion Dr. Hans Richter's services as conductor. His influence proved a potent factor, and under his baton the rank and file gave a virile rendering of Beethoven's overture to 'Egmont,' first introduced in London by the Philharmonic Society in 1810, a year after its composition. Bach's magnificent second Suite in B minor for flute and strings, which created an extraordinary sensation at our musical festival in October last, formed one of the chief attractions of the concert, especially as it was graphically rendered. The symphony was Dvorák's 'From the New World,' and the novelty of the evening Granville Bantock's comedy-overture 'The pierrot of the minute.' Miss Perceval Allen gave an intensely dramatic exposition of Weber's 'Ocean, thou mighty monster.' A popular orchestral concert was also given by the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra in the Town Hall on April 2, conducted by Mr. H. Lyell Taylor. The programme was of a strictly popular character, the best results being attained with Liszt's first 'Hungarian rhapsody' in F and Massenet's picturesque suite 'Le Cid.' Miss Muccia Albertini, the clever young pianist, played Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto No. 1 in D flat minor, Op. 23, with extraordinary virility and flawless technique.

The Midland Musical Society have for more than a quarter of a century always supplied the Good Friday evening concerts, and for many years Gounod's 'Redemption' formed a most popular attraction, but the choice this year fell on Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' the English version, 'At the foot of the Cross,' being used, followed by Beethoven's Mass in C. The performance took place at the Town Hall as usual, and attracted a crowded assembly. The choir achieved its best success in the Mass, but owing to the length of the programme, Mr. A. J. Cotton, the conductor, was unfortunately compelled to omit a portion of this work. The principal artists were Miss Nellie Finch, Miss Minnie Hackett, Mr. John Needham and Mr. Ernest Quinton, Mr. C. W. Perkins occupying his customary place at the organ.

The Birmingham Choral Union gave their last Popular Saturday night concert at the Town Hall on April 9, under Mr. Thomas Facer's watchful conductorship. Special interest was attached to the first performance of a portion of Mr. Royle Shore's 'Requiem,' given to organ accompaniment. The composer has prefaced his work by a Prelude, the first that has ever been written to a 'Requiem,' which Mr. C. W. Perkins ably rendered on the organ. It is based on the Gregorian plain-chant and other themes appearing in the Mass. The Prelude was followed by the Introit, for chorus, and the only other number given was the Graduale, set for soprano solo, mainly constructed on the plain-chant of the Introit. Unfortunately, the nine-part unaccompanied contrapuntal Kyrie Eleison, the most important and most academic portion of the 'Requiem,' could not be given owing to insufficient preparation. The Graduale was excellently sung by Miss Lucie Rosenberg. The composer appears to claim that the 'Requiem' is the first ever specially written for English ecclesiastical purposes before or since the Reformation, and composed as it is to both Latin and English words, it is intended to make a wide appeal. The choir afterwards gave a telling rendering of the unaccompanied part-songs: Gaul's 'The silent land,' Macfarren's 'The Sands of Dee,' and Leslie's 'How sweet the moonlight sleeps.' Mr. C. W. Perkins played two of the organ solos given by him before the Kaiser, and Swinnerton Heap's 'Festal march.' The songs by Miss Lucie Rosenberg, Miss Edith Kingsford, Mr. Ernest R. Ludlow and Mr. Joseph Lycett were much appreciated.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society gave their fourth and last concert of the current series in the Town Hall on April 14, special interest being attached to this last function on account of the first performance here of Dr. Walford Davies's great choral work 'Noble numbers,' which, it will be remembered, was produced at the Hereford festival last year with so much success. Dr. Sinclair, who ably conducted, had spared no pains in its preparation, and a word of just acknowledgment is also due to the assistant chorus-master, Mr. Allen K. Blackall. The choir sang superbly, and Dr. Walford Davies, who was present at the performance and received an ovation at the close, justly remarked to the choristers in the committee room during the interval that there was a sincerity and breeziness in their singing that was absolutely refreshing. The principal artists, Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Coates, Mr. Ivor Foster, Mr. James Coleman, and Master A. J. White, rendered valuable aid, and Mr. C. W. Perkins ably discharged his duties as organist. The choir further distinguished itself in Elgar's exquisitely written unaccompanied chorus in six parts 'Go, song of mine,' and in the Finale from Wagner's 'Meistersinger,' the principal artists also taking part.

In order to make better known and draw attention to the great Pageant of London to be held at the Crystal Palace in May, June and July, the promoters and organizers of the festival have arranged for a series of orchestral concerts in the Provinces. Birmingham was the first provincial city visited, and a concert was given in the Town Hall on April 6, with the Festival of Empire Orchestra of one hundred performers, conducted by Dr. Frederic H. Cowen.

The newly-formed Acocks Green Choral Society essayed for their first concert Villiers Stanford's 'The Revenge,' which formed the first part of a programme given at the Public Hall, Acocks Green, near Birmingham, on April 11, conducted by Miss Agnes C. Birch.

The Royal Society of Artists' musical matinées in connection with the Spring Exhibition of pictures were successfully inaugurated on April 9, under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction. An excellent and varied programme has been arranged for the season, which terminates on June 11.

The choral and orchestral departments of the Midland Institute School of Music joined forces and gave a 'Bach' concert in the large Lecture Theatre of that Institution on April 16, the principal, Professor Granville Bantock, conducting. The works performed were the sacred cantatas, 'Weeping, waiting' and 'Soul, array thyself,' and a Concerto for klavier and two flutes.

BRISTOL, BATH AND DISTRICT.

A pleasing concert was given in the large room of the Bristol Grammar School on April 2. Mr. C. W. Stear (director of the music at the School, and conductor of the Bristol Musical Society) was at the organ, and played several favourite compositions with his accustomed ability. Mr. Johan W. Duys skilfully executed some violin solos, the principal being Max Bruch's Romance in A minor and A major. Songs were rendered agreeably by Miss Marion Gaskell.

On April 4 a concert was held at the Victoria Rooms, in aid of the parochial funds of St. Luke's, a poor district in the East of Bristol. Mr. George Riseley, as Sheriff of Bristol, arranged the performance, and by his influence many qualified singers and players were induced to take part. The chief interest centred in the presence of the City of Gloucester Civic Quartet, consisting of the Mayor (Mr. Hallam Clarke), the Mayoress, the Sheriff (Mr. Bower), and Mrs. Dykes Bower. With considerable taste the party rendered Henry Smart's 'My true love hath my heart,' and, in obedience to the wishes of the audience for an encore, repeated the second stanza. Their other piece was E. A. Sydenham's part-song 'The Maiden of the Fleur de Lys.' About fifty members of Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society attended, and under the careful direction of Mr. Riseley interpreted effectively some of their favourite part music. Miss Gladys Moger and Miss Gertrude Winchester contributed songs, and Miss Mildred Pritchard (pianoforte) and Mr. Harold Bernard (violin) exerted themselves to good purpose. The accompanists were Mr. Riseley, and his nephew, Mr. G. Herbert Riseley.

The fourth and last concert of the season of the Bristol Choral Society attracted a large audience at Colston Hall on April 6. Choir and orchestra numbered 520, Mr. Harold Bernard holding the principal violin and Mr. G. Herbert Riseley being at the organ. The programme comprised

Stanford's 'The Revenge,' Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' Sir Hubert Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens' and two choruses from 'Israel in Egypt.' Miss Nicholls was heard with great delight in Schubert's cantata, Weber's 'Ocean! thou mighty monster,' and two ballads by Hamilton Harty. Considerable enthusiasm was manifested at the fine playing of Zimbalist, whose chief display was in Max Bruch's 'Scottish fantasia.' The orchestra performed successfully Litolf's 'Robespierre' overture and the '1812' overture of Tchaikovsky. Much of the credit of the enjoyable concert was due to the efforts of Mr. Risleley, the Society's conductor.

On April 7 there was a chamber concert at Clifton, the performers being Miss K. Tudor Pole (violin), Miss Marion Humphries (pianoforte), and Miss Kate Rickards (vocalist). The principal work performed was Dvorák's Sonata in F major, for violin and pianoforte, which went smoothly. Miss Tudor Pole played Tartini's Sonata in G minor excellently.

The Bristol New Philharmonic Society brought their ninth season to a close on April 13 by a concert at the Victoria Rooms. Sir Hubert Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' and Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' were admirably given, the humour of the latter being well conveyed. Miss Edith Evans and Mr. Thorpe Bates were the soloists. Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' overture and Schumann's 'Rosamunde' overture were played with animation by an orchestra of which Mr. Harold Bernard was leader. Mr. Arnold Barter conducted.

On April 5, the Bath Choral and Orchestral Society gave their second concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms, the first part comprising Sections 1 and 2 of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' the soloists being Miss Norah Newport, Mr. Furness Williams and Mr. Joseph Farrington. Mr. J. W. Duys, leader of the orchestra, played with taste a Romance by Max Bruch. Mr. H. T. Sims conducted.

The Clevedon Philharmonic Society, on April 6, held a concert at the Public Hall. The chief features were Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' and Sir Charles Stanford's 'The Revenge,' which were carefully performed. Mr. F. S. Gardner led the orchestra and Mr. C. W. Stear conducted.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Emmanuel Choral Society, who confine their attention to sacred music, gave on March 23 a performance of Gaul's 'The ten virgins,' conducted by Mr. Reginald Waddy. 'Esther, the beautiful Queen' (Bradbury) was sung by the Keyham Wesleyan Choir on March 25, conducted by Mr. E. B. Collar. Dr. Weekes's Choral Society chose 'The golden legend' for their second concert on April 6, the Orchestral Society collaborating, led by Mr. John Pardew and Mr. A. E. Serle. The principal vocalists were Miss Ethel Pascho, Madame Amy Dewhurst, Messrs. Lloyd Chandos, Dan Price and J. J. Kent. At the Corporation Concert on April 9, conducted by Mr. H. Moreton, Borough organist, the Guildhall Male-Voice Choir sang with richly musical tone and good expression several part-songs and choruses by F. Behr ('Invocation to Music,' solo by Mr. John Gill), Oliver King, J. Ames, Sullivan, E. Nichol and Verdi. Mr. Manley Martin, on April 11, combined his Mutley and Mannemead Choral Society and the choir of St. Catherine's Church, of which he is organist, and gave an excellent performance of 'The Hymn of Praise.' The choir thus numbered a hundred, and sang with artistic effect, Mr. Harold Lake presiding at the organ. Sherwell Choir, a highly-cultured combination trained by Mr. A. C. Faulk, gave a delightful rendering of the 'Spring' section from Haydn's 'The Seasons' on April 13, Mr. Harold Lake leading the orchestra.

Mrs. Herring-Mason's Amateur Opera Company have given a series of performances, reaching their high-water mark in lyric opera. 'H.M.S. Pinafore' was given in Easter week; 'La Traviata' and 'The Sorcerer' in successive weeks. Much admiration was excited by the beautiful singing of Miss Ffigne-Mason in the first two operas. A costume recital of 'Songs of the west' was given at Mutley on April 14, under the direction of Mr. Manley Martin, with Mr. Donald Cumming as stage manager. At the Corporation Concert on April 2, Miss Evelyn Hingston played the solo part of Grieg's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. The band was that of the Royal Garrison Artillery, conducted by Mr. R. G. Evans, and Beethoven's C minor Symphony (No. 5) was included in the programme. At a Matinée Musicale given by the officers of the Royal Marine Light Infantry on April 4, the regimental band gave an excellent programme under Mr. Frank Winterbottom, a noteworthy item being a Concertstück for violoncello and orchestra, with Band-Sergeant Pike as soloist. Included in the current series of Library Lectures was one on 'Our Sea Songs,' given by Mr. J. H. Lucas on April 2, also one given by Mr. Reginald Waddy on April 23, on 'Shakespeare on songs and singing.'

The programme of the last of Mr. Frank Winterbottom's Symphony Concerts, which took place on April 18, was according to custom chosen by a plébiscite. It was gratifying to find that Beethoven headed the list of symphonists represented.

OTHER TOWNS.

A performance of the opera 'The goose girl,' by Revelstoke Choral Class on March 30, was conducted by Miss Edith Reade. The Society at Chagford, conducted by Mr. R. Percy Collins, on March 30 sang 'The ancient mariner,' with band led by Mr. W. Baker. The new Society at Callington, at their first concert on March 31, gave 'The Bride of Dunkerron,' conducted by Mr. J. H. Lucas; the Exmouth Choral Society performed 'The golden legend' on April 1, conducted by Mr. Raymond Wilmot, and the Plympton Choral Society sang part-songs and choruses by Wagner, Fanning, Willan, Rendall, Pinsuti and Cowen on April 11, Mr. David Parkes conducting. At their sixth annual concert at Exeter, on April 7, the Devon Ladies' String Orchestra, led by Miss Sybil French and conducted by Mr. Reginald B. Moore, introduced two dances by Debussy, 'Sacrée' and 'Profane,' with Mr. Alfred Kastner as solo harpist. Another novelty was the Romance in C of Sibelius. At Sidmouth, on April 12, the Choral and Orchestral Societies collaborated in a good performance of Gade's 'The Crusaders,' conducted by Mr. J. A. Bellamy, with Miss Euneta Truscott, Mrs. Bellamy, Messrs. Gwilym Richards and Dan Price as solo vocalists. On the same date, in North Devon, the Musical Society at Barnstaple, whose choir is famed for its beautiful and fresh-toned singing, gave the 'Messiah' under the baton of Dr. H. J. Edwards, whose reappearance after long absence through illness was loudly cheered. A performance by the Exeter Male-Voice Choir, on April 20, conducted by Mr. F. J. Pinn, and a rendering by the Torquay Musical Association on the same date of 'Blest pair of Sirens' and Dvorák's 'Te Deum,' conducted by Mr. T. H. Webb, complete the record of a busy month in choral work. The programme for the festival of the amalgamated Exeter Oratorio Society and the Western Counties Musical Association, which will take place on April 27, includes the 'Redemption,' 'The Revenge,' and the 'Bon-bon' choral suite of Coleridge-Taylor. Mr. Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' has been selected for performance next season.

CORNWALL.

The Orchestral Society formed in Penzance three years ago, under the conductorship of Mr. Walter Barnes, has made a fresh start, and at a concert on March 28 proved to be an excellent combination, augmented to forty performers, and led by Mr. F. Wellington, the programme including Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. On March 30, Mr. H. M. Lamerton's Choral and Orchestral Societies at Bodmin performed Macfarren's 'May-Day.' On the same date the Choral Society at Looe, from which Mr. Harold Lake, working under the difficulties of isolation of situation, obtains praiseworthy results, sang 'The Bride of Dunkerron,' with Madame Lillian Langdon and Messrs. Orlando Jolliffe and George Meadows as principals. Mr. Seymour Pile has formed a new madrigal choir at Truro, whose first concert on April 1 was attended with success. Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was excellently sung by the Liskeard Choral Society on April 8, conducted by Mr. A. C. Faull. Also on that day, in Truro Cathedral, at a service of praise, the Truro and Falmouth Philharmonic Societies combined under Canon Corfe, and sang the 'Messiah,' assisted by Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Maude Wright, Messrs. Lloyd Chandos and Dan Price. The band was led by Mr. F. Wellington, and Dr. Monk was at the organ. In the evening the Truro Society, at their annual concert, sang part-songs by Pinsuti, Leslie, &c., Canon Corfe conducting. 'The Creation' was performed by the Torpoint Choral Association on April 13. Mr. F. W. Moreton conducted, and assistance was given by J. Lanyon (boy soprano) and Messrs. John Gill and George Meadows. Mr. Richard White conducted the Penzance Choral Society on April 13 in an excellent rendering of 'Acis and Galatea.' Mr. Walter Barnes led the orchestra, with Mr. Alan H. Thomas at the organ.

DUBLIN.

The Dublin Orchestral Society's third concert of the current season took place on March 21, when Dr. Esposito gave a really memorable performance of Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony—quite one of the best things the band has yet done. Leonardo Leo's overture to 'Sant'Elena al Calvario,' and the Vorspiel 'Klingsor's magic garden,' 'Good Friday music,' and the latter part of Act I. from 'Parsifal' completed the programme. On March 28 and five following days, the Amateur Operatic Society (conducted by Dr. Esposito) gave admirable performances of Bellini's 'Norma,' Weber's 'Der Freischütz' and for the first time on any stage, Esposito's 'The tinker and the fairy.' The latter work proved very successful, the libretto, by Dr. Douglas Hyde, giving the composer plenty of scope for variety of treatment. There are three characters: 'The Fairy' (soprano), 'A Youth' (tenor) and 'The Tinker' (baritone), these being extremely well acted and sung by Miss Nettie Edwards, Mr. Thomas J. Collins and Mr. John C. Browner. Towards the close of the work an unseen chorus of fairies is introduced with charming effect. In 'Der Freischütz' (for which recitatives were specially written by Dr. Esposito) the characters were taken by Miss Lena Munro (Agnes), Miss Queenie Eaton and Miss Kathleen McCully (Annie), Mr. William Mulcahy (Rodolph), Mr. Reginald Montgomery and Mr. Ernest Cameron (Kaspar), Mr. Alfred G. Birch (Kuno), Mr. Brannigan (Kilian), Mr. Stanley Lyon (Prince Ottokar) and Mr. J. O'C. Reynolds (The Hermit). In 'Norma,' the title-part was sung by Miss Alice Rafter, Adalgisa by Miss Queenie Eaton, Pollione by Mr. W. H. Jones, and Orovoso by Mr. Alfred G. Birch and Mr. J. O'C. Reynolds. The text used was that in Novello's edition of both this opera and 'Der Freischütz.'

On April 15 the North City Choral Society (conductor, Mr. George Harrison) gave a concert at which Gounod's 'Gallia' (soloist, Miss Nettie Edwards) and Joseph Adams's 'King Conor' (soloist, Mr. Robert Cobbe) formed the chief part of the programme.

The Feis Ceil (Irish Music Festival), May 9 to 14, promises to be successful this year, as there are no less than 301 entries for the solo-singing competitions alone. Mr. Joseph O'Mara is the judge in these competitions.

EDINBURGH.

The Northern Choral Society (conductor, Mr. James Crichton) gave their annual concert in the Music Hall on March 21. The principal features of the programme were Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night' and Cowen's 'John Gilpin,' which were admirably performed. The soloists were Miss Catherine Mentiply, Mr. Alexander Webster and Mr. Bridge-Peters. A small orchestra, led by Mr. James Terry, with Mr. Charles O'Brien at the pianoforte, supplied the accompaniments.

The fourteenth annual concert of Mr. Moonie's Choir took place in the Music Hall on March 23. Since the inauguration of the choir, Mr. Moonie has produced a large number of works new to Edinburgh audiences, and on this occasion the programme contained no fewer than three novelties, viz., Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'The doom of Oleg,' for male voices; Edgar Tinell's 'The three Knights'; and Debussy's 'The Blessed Damsel.' The other numbers were Bach's Magnificat and Cowen's 'Ode to the Passions.' Throughout the evening the choir sang with the breadth of conception, beauty of tone and phrasing which have become recognised features in their performances; but perhaps specially noteworthy was the rendering of the last chorus in the 'Ode to the Passions,' which in its warmth and fervour of tone was a remarkable exhibition of choral singing. Misses Mabel Manson, Amy Gallon, Alice Cleugh and M. Henderson, Mr. J. F. S. Adams and Mr. George Campbell were the soloists, and an excellent orchestra, led by Mr. Winram, played the accompaniments most artistically.

The annual concert of the Western Choral Society (conductor, Mr. D. Blair) was held in the Music Hall on March 23. The programme comprised Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' part-songs and vocal and instrumental solos. The singing of the choir gave evidence of much careful training, and received frequent manifestations of approval from the audience. The soloists were Miss Chrissie Blair, Mr. J. F. S. Adams, and Mr. Watt Jupp (violinist). The orchestra was led by Mr. Dambmann, and Mr. T. Paterson Lamb acted as pianist.

Mr. Gavin Godfrey's Choir, a new organization which should soon take a high place among choral societies in the city, gave their first concert in the Music Hall on March 30. The programme included a selection from Gounod's 'Faust,' Somervell's 'The charge of the Light Brigade,' Dudley Buck's 'Ode to Music,' and miscellaneous pieces. The choir, which numbers some hundred and thirty voices, sings with good, solid tone, certainty of attack, and a commendable degree of attention to nuance. The soloists were Miss Rana Taggart, Mrs. George Campbell, Mr. W. S. Hamilton and Mr. George Campbell. A small orchestra, led by Mr. Winram, with Mr. John Hartley at the organ, and Mr. J. T. Millar at the pianoforte, lent efficient aid.

Broughton Place Musical Association (conductor, Dr. W. B. Ross) gave an interesting recital in the church on March 31. The works performed were Elgar's 'The Black Knight' and Dr. Ross's 'Ode to the Passions'—a composition of much merit. The singing of the choir was eminently praiseworthy, and gave evident pleasure to the audience. The soloists were Miss Margaret C. Troup and Mr. John A. Purves. An orchestra led by Mr. James Terry, with Mr. John Hartley at the organ, supplied the accompaniments.

At the recital of St. Paul's United Free Church Musical Association (conductor, Mr. A. Chisholm), given on March 31, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha' received an intelligent and impressive rendering. The remainder of the programme was devoted to sacred choruses and solos. The soloists were Miss Mary B. Reid, Miss Molly Murray, Mr. W. P. Crichton, Mr. H. F. Falconer, and Mr. Fred Falconer. Miss A. W. Chisholm at the pianoforte, and Mr. R. M. Blackwood, officiated as accompanists.

Under the auspices of the Edinburgh Musical Education Society, Mr. Tobias Matthay, on March 28, gave a lecture on 'The principles and teaching of Interpretation' (pianoforte).

GLASGOW.

The Western Choral Union, a new organization ably conducted by Mr. Hugh S. Robertson, made its first public appearance on March 23, giving an excellent rendering of the 'Messiah.' The chorus, numbering 160 voices, sang with quite a refreshing freedom and 'grip,' and the new choir gives promise of filling an important place in the musical life of the city. The solos were given by Misses Boyd Steven and Rachel Hunt, and Messrs. James Hay and Hamilton Harris, and the accompaniments were played on the pianoforte and organ by Mr. J. E. Hodgson and Mr. J. A. Cromar respectively.

The last concert of the season by the Glasgow Bach Choir took place on April 19, and it proved to be one of the most interesting of the series. The programme included the Concerto in C major for two pianofortes and string orchestra, the Concerto in E major for solo violin and string orchestra, the Chromatic fantasia and fugue for pianoforte, and the cantata 'The Chase,' an English translation of which was specially made for use at this concert. Mr. J. M. Diack discharged the duties of conductor.

GLOUCESTER AND DISTRICT.

The annual concert of the Gloucestershire Orchestral Society was held at the county town on March 30. Under Dr. Brewer's experienced direction, and led by Mr. W. H. Reed, the band, numbering over one hundred performers, gave a most enjoyable performance, including Schumann's Symphony No. 1 (in B flat), Tchaikovsky's delightful 'Casse-Noisette,' a portion of the Bach Suite (B minor), and Weber's 'Der Freischütz' overture. Mr. W. H. Reed played the violin solos Dvůrák's 'Slavische Tänze' (No. 7) and Hubay's 'Zephyr' with very great taste. The vocalist was Miss Alice Prowse.

The Gloucester Instrumental Society gave their annual concert on April 7, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Woodward. The instrumentalists gave an excellent account of themselves, and successfully accomplished their varied task. The programme included 'Tannhäuser' march; Symphony 'Italian' (Mendelssohn); 'The Bartered Bride' overture (Smetana); and the Fantasia 'La Bohème' (Puccini). Miss Minnie Embrey was the vocalist, and Mr. J. E. R. Teague's violoncello solo, 'Kol Nidrei' (Max Bruch) was beautifully played. The Wye Glee Singers contributed six numbers and were excellently received.

On April 1, an interesting concert was given at Cheltenham for the benefit of Mr. Horace Teague, the able conductor of the Cheltenham Municipal Orchestra. The programme consisted solely of items by local composers, each of whom conducted his own works, the band having been augmented to about thirty instrumentalists for the occasion. The programme was as follows: 'Petite' suite (E. Cuthbert Nunn); vales, 'La Coquette' and 'Chanson de Joie' (C. H. G. Mottram); song-cycle from 'Shakespeare's garden' (Janet Salsbury), Miss Cottam (accompanied by the composer); 'Stimmungsbild' (Mood-picture), specially composed for this concert; and solo dance from 'Feast of roses' (Heller Nicholls); 'In days gone by,' from the opera 'The lady of Bayonne' (A. E. Dyer), Mr. M. D. Seaton (conducted by Mr. F. G. Dyer, the composer's son); 'Remembrance' and 'Peggy' (Horace Teague); 'Dreaming' (A. H. Brewer); three Valses for orchestra (R. H. Bellairs); 'Awake! the morn' (Louis Saurin), the Lyric Glee Singers (specially rehearsed by the composer); 'She sleeps, my lady sleeps' and 'Sleep, dear one, sleep' (Ernest A. Dicks), Miss May Edwards (accompanied by the composer); and 'Inferno e Paradiso' (Lewis Hann).

After years of work in the interpretation of sacred compositions, the Cirencester Choral Society once more made an incursion into the realm of secular music, and gave, on April 6, a capital rendering of the 'Mikado.' The opera was very well staged, the costumes were excellent, and the characters were admirably sustained. Four performances were given, besides a matinee on the Thursday. Mr. Harry T. Davies, of London, was the stage-manager, and Mr. A. H. Gibbons conducted the choir and full orchestra drawn from Covent Garden Opera House.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

One of the most interesting and successful performances which stand to the credit of the Welsh Choral Union, and they are many in number, was that given of Bach's B minor Mass on March 19. It was the more notable by reason of its being the first performance of this stupendous work in Liverpool. Mr. Harry Evans and the Welsh Choral Union have now removed a standing reproach. The work had been carefully prepared, and chorally it was exceedingly well done. In the double-choruses a larger force would of course have been an advantage; otherwise the accurate, resolute, expressive singing all through is only to be recorded in terms of praise. Equally commendable were the vocal principals, Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Harrison and Mr. Harry Dearth. Only less near perfection was the orchestral share, the trumpet parts more especially. The interest and appreciation of a crowded audience was very apparent.

In aid of the building fund of the University College of North Wales, the Welsh Choral Union gave a concert on April 9, at which was performed Mr. Harry Evans's romantic cantata 'Dafydd ap Gwilym,' which was written for the Royal Eisteddfod held at Llangollen in 1908. The work is a clever and musically setting of a libretto by the Rev. David Adams, which offers opportunities both lyrical and choral of which the composer has fully availed himself. The characteristic features of Welsh music and minstrelsy are suggestively introduced, with an effective touch of modernity, especially in the orchestration. Sung in the vernacular, the excellence of the Welsh language for singing was a matter of remark. In this quality it is apparently not far behind the Italian.

At the twelfth and closing concert of the Philharmonic Society, on March 22, a performance was given (after the lapse of twenty-one years) of Sir A. C. Mackenzie's cantata 'The Dream of Jubal.' It is interesting to recall that this scholarly setting of Mr. Joseph Bennett's fine poem was specially commissioned for the Jubilee concert of the Society in 1889, on which occasion the composer conducted, Miss Macintyre, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Charles Fry (reciter) being the solo artists. It is general knowledge that the characteristic feature of the work is the association of recitation with instrumental accompaniment, and among the rare instances of the employment of this method by eminent composers, Sir A. C. Mackenzie's 'Dream of Jubal' is accounted to be the most important and elaborate work of its kind. The composer, who was unable to be present owing to pressure of work, was represented in the audience by Lady Mackenzie and on the platform and by their daughter, Miss Mackenzie, whose graceful presence and declamatory art enabled her to fulfil the exacting rôle of the Narrator with gratifying distinction. Her words were clearly heard all over the hall, no small feat for a lady-reciter to achieve under such unusual and difficult conditions. Vocally associated with her in the performance, which was given under Dr. F. H. Cowen's direction, were Miss Edith Evans, Miss Ada Phillips, Mr. John Harrison and Mr. R. W. Lee. The relatively small share for the choir was very well sung, while instrumentally the ingenuity and suggestiveness of the orchestration received fine interpretation.

A new and important choral and orchestral organization, the Catholic Philharmonic Society, gave an interesting performance of Dr. Horatio W. Parker's 'Hora Novissima' on April 4. The Catholic community may at last be congratulated upon coming into line with other denominations, and a warm welcome is extended to the Society by all interested in the extension of musical art, more especially as we are likely to hear through its medium examples of Catholic music and of plain-song. Under the direction of Mr. H. P. Allen, a capable choir of 250 has been organized and evidently well trained. With an orchestra of sixty, led by Mr. Akeroyd, and with Mr. C. H. Fogg at the organ, a really excellent performance of the choral features of Dr. Parker's beautiful work was given, and the soloists had been well chosen in Madame Emily Breare, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. Robert Radford. In the miscellaneous second part, three interesting examples of plain-song were offered in 'Salve Regina,' 'Alleluia, Rosa vernans' (cantor, Rev. W. Foy), and 'Salve Festa Dies.' Accompanied by the organ, these fine melodies were well sung, although the note of spiritual exaltation was necessarily missing in the atmosphere of the concert-room.

The Moody-Manners Opera Company, during their recent short season, gave a first performance here of Mr. Nicholas Gatty's one-act 'Duke or Devil.' This fantastic and humorous little work keeps the vocal principals, chorus and band incessantly busy for half-an-hour, and signs of inspiration are less apparent than strenuous efforts at dramatic intensity. Under Mr. Eckhold's direction the work was well done, especially by chorus and principals, who included Mr. Moorhouse (Duke of Bologna), Mr. Magrath (Priest) and Miss Raymonde Amy (Bianca).

The 'Festival of Empire' Orchestra, conducted by Dr. F. H. Cowen, visited Liverpool on April 11. Apart from the business objects of the visit, which were expounded by Viscount Hill, and Dr. McCall, Agent-General for Tasmania, its musical features were considerable, the orchestra being assisted by Miss Dorothy Silk, who sang 'Bid me discourse' very fluently, Mr. R. Pollak (violin) and Mr. Renard (violinello). Sir A. C. Mackenzie's 'Britannia' overture was a happily-chosen prelude, and more intelligible to a mixed audience, unsupplied with annotated programmes, than was Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung.'

Under the direction of Mr. Ernest Schiever, the Wirral Amateur Orchestral Society (strings only) gave a concert in the Birkenhead Town Hall on April 14, at which a new Fantaisie for string orchestra, 'Vaila,' specially written for and inscribed to the Society by Mr. Ernest Bryson, was successfully heard. In three short connected movements, all in 5-4 time, the music is symphonic in scope and of intrinsic musical interest, apart from the fanciful quasi-legend with which it is associated. The slow movement, which opens with a broad and Elgaresque melody, is especially arresting, and the Finale is sustained in vivacity. The work in its originality of thought and harmonic treatment adds to the composer's reputation, and although by no means easy to play it is to be recommended to all string organizations with an ideal. At this concert, Max Bruch's G minor Violin concerto was very finely played by Mr. Vivian Burrows.

The Liscard Orchestral Society closed their season on April 2 with a programme which contained Reissiger's overture 'Yelva,' Wagner's 'Good Friday' music, and Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A minor, cleverly played by Miss Hilda Smart. The vocalist was Miss Hilda Cragg-James, and Mr. Philip R. Smart conducted. Opportunity to three skilled soloists, Messrs. T. Rimmer (violin), W. Spice (flute), and W. Macdonald (clarinet), was afforded by Döppler's 'Nocturne.'

The Southport Choral Society gave their last subscription concert of the season, on March 22, in the Cambridge Hall. The excellent singing of the choir was, as usual, the main feature of the evening, and fine interpretations were given of Mendelssohn's 'Christus,' Schubert's 'Song of the spirits,' Grieg's 'Autumn storms' and Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to music.' The orchestra played Bach's 'Allegro, Sarabande and Bourrée,' Scharwenka's 'Andante religioso,' Schumann's 'Träumerei,' and, with the pianoforte (Miss Lumbers), Ole Olsen's 'Petite suite' in A minor. The solo vocalists were Miss May Currie and Mr. Samuel Hempshall. Mr. J. C. Clarke conducted.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The early Spring months usually find the travelling Opera Companies on tour through the County Palatine, and in the last few weeks we have had the Castellano Opera Company playing for a fortnight at the Gaiety Theatre; the Carl Rosa Company, more recently, being at the Theatre Royal, adding Beethoven's 'Fidelio' and Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' to their usual repertory. Madame Gleeson-White, in 'Tannhäuser' and 'Don Giovanni,' exhibited unsuspected talent as an actress, besides singing with far greater freedom than her previous platform performances have displayed. The orchestral playing under Mr. Goossens was much more satisfactory than usual. The Moody-Manners Companies have been visiting various Lancashire towns, in nearly all of them presenting Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah' with marked success. On April 14, from Liverpool, they paid a flying matinée visit to the Manchester Hippodrome and gave Manchester its first taste of Saint-Saëns's work in its operatic guise, several concert performances having been heard here under the late Sir Charles Hallé. Miss Zélie de Lussan perhaps introduced too much of the modern spirit into her impersonation of Delilah, but it was still a very fine reading of the character. Mr. Joseph O'Mara sang the music of Samson. Mr. Charles McGrath, Mr. Charles Moorhouse and Mr. William Dever took the other principal parts, and Mr. Richard Eckhold conducted.

The projected performance of Wagner's 'Ring' is commented upon elsewhere (p. 298).

Thanks to our wonderful censorship, music-lovers in this country have had to wait a long time for 'Salomé' and 'Samson and Delilah,' and it seems hard to realise that Goldmark's 'Die Königin von Saba' was produced thirty-five years ago and only performed for the first time in England a few days ago by the Carl Rosa Company at the Manchester Theatre Royal. Such a subject naturally lends itself to spectacular display, and the composer's love of stage-pageantry no doubt led to the illogical introduction of marches and dances and the like, which have no necessary connection with the development of the plot. These scenic opportunities were turned to fullest advantage on this occasion, and nowadays, when 'well-put-on' stage shows are in such vogue, this will no doubt count for much with some sections of the public. The glowing Oriental colour of the music appeals powerfully; its luxuriance entices you, but rarely grips or convinces; musicians steeped in the work of Strauss and our foremost English composers would feel this inevitably. The performance lasted four hours, yet the audience and performers gave themselves up completely to the sensuous music. Mr. Charles Victor excelled as King Solomon; Miss Doris Woodall, as the Queen of Sheba, sang the impassioned music of the Eastern queen with fine abandon; Mr. Walter Wheatley filled the rôle of Assad (betrothed to Sulamith, but really the object of the Queen of Sheba's passion); Miss Beatrice Miranda, possessor of a lovely voice, played Sulamith. Mr. Eugene Goossens brought his forces—actors, chorus and orchestra alike—through their trying ordeal with flying colours. Not often does a première run so smoothly. Musicians from all parts were present in numbers, and an enthusiastic audience went home delighted, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour.

Music-halls here not infrequently have put on 'turns' quite out of the ordinary run, which have a genuine musical interest; a notable case in point was the appearance at the aforesaid Hippodrome of the Slaviansky Russian Choir of some fifty singers, the bass section being possessed of phenomenally deep voices. In richly varied national garb they sang (to our ears) strangely weird and, at times, barbarous music of the folk-song order. But in every way the visit was a great success.

Mr. Brand Lane concluded his season with what was described as the 'Choir benefit.' These concerts are mainly of the 'ballad' order, the great stars of the musical firmament appearing; generally, also, a choir of about 250 voices sings unaccompanied works. Mr. Brand Lane is a regular visitor at the competition festivals, and on this occasion Coleridge-Taylor's Rhapsody 'Seadrift,' Bantock's lovely 'On Himalay,' Max Bruch's 'Morgengensang,' and Rutland Boughton's 'Young Herchard' variations were sung, in addition to items of lesser musical worth.

The Schumann Centenary was celebrated on March 12 (somewhat in advance of the actual date) by a splendid performance at the Schiller-Anstalt of the 'Pilgrimage of the Rose.' The choir was composed of Miss Fillunger's lady pupils, and Mr. Walter Nesbitt brought eighteen members of his male-voice choir. The work was sung in its original form with a pianoforte accompaniment, which was played by Miss Eugénie Schumann, daughter of the composer. Apparently the orchestration of this work was somewhat in the nature of an afterthought, and it must be said that the simpler accompaniment matched more perfectly the somewhat slender proportions of this work. Mr. Walter Nesbitt, at Miss Fillunger's special request, had rehearsed the chorus, and directed a most efficient performance, which gave complete satisfaction to Miss Schumann.

For a couple of years past Mr. H. P. Allen, the organist of the Salford Roman Catholic Cathedral, has been training a choral body known as the Catholic Philharmonic Society. A year ago they essayed 'Gerontius,' and on April 5 sang Horatio Parker's 'Hora Novissima,' Bach's motet 'Praise Jehovah in His splendour,' Elgar's 'Sursum Corda,' and three plain-song melodies: 'Salve Regina,' 'Rosa Vernans,' and 'Salve festa dies.' The soloists were Madame Emily Breare, Miss Phyllis Lett, Messrs. Gervase Elwes and Robert Radford. The general character of this choir's work was distinctly hopeful. It was not to be expected that they could at once leap into the front rank, but a body that could sing the a cappella chorus 'Urbs Syon Unica' so well, may be expected to flourish artistically, and to fill a distinct place in the musical life of Manchester; unhappily the public support on this occasion was quite inadequate.

Miss Say Ashworth, who nobly devotes time and money to the brightening and uplifting of girl-life in the dingier mill districts of Ancoats and Salford, has in the course of a dozen years evolved female-voice choirs which have achieved astonishing artistic results. Arrangements have been completed whereby forty of these girls from the mills and factories are to go next August to Switzerland, there to sing with the orchestra in the Kur-Platz of Lucerne. Recently with the help of our musical Lord Mayor; these choirs, junior and senior, gave an attractive concert in the Town Hall, singing amongst other things Berlioz's 'Ballad of Ophelia,' Wolstenholme's setting of 'Three Fishers,' Leslie's arrangement of Weelkes's 'The Nightingale,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'The Pixies.'

The Manchester University Classical Society have given the 'Frogs' of Aristophanes; in the rhythmic movement of their dances, and in the rendering of Sir Hubert Parry's music, the finish and sureness of the chorus were quite admirable, and both producers and performers are to be congratulated on the successful discharge of such difficult work. The following evening Mr. Joseph Bonnet, of the Church of St. Eustace, Paris, gave a recital on the fine University organ in the Whitworth Hall; clear conception, brilliant execution, keen judgment in registration, and a particularly subtle and delicate adjustment of touch were the chief characteristics of the recital, the programme including works by Bach, Buxtehude, Clérambault, Mendelssohn's sixth Sonata, the 'Esquisses' of Schumann, and a Suite by the organist himself.

The students of the Royal Manchester College of Music have usually performed an opera at about Easter tide, but this year, for the first time, there was substituted an examination concert more on the lines of a typical German Conservatorium 'Prüfung,' the students who were selected to play having the advantage of full orchestral accompaniments directed by Dr. Brodsky, which formed quite a notable feature of the evening. Miss Nellie Anderton and Miss Edith McCullagh were the vocalists, Mr. Alwyne Brown and Mr. John Mills played movements from the Schumann and Liszt pianoforte concertos, and two pupils of Dr. Brodsky, Mr. Alfred Barker and Mr. Naum Blinder were heard in the Bach A minor and Beethoven concertos.

At the 'open practice' on April 20, interesting items were played by members of Mr. Fuchs's ensemble class, other performers including students working under Mr. Egon Petri, Mr. Max Mayer, Dr. Pyne, Miss Edith Robinson, Dr. Brodsky and Miss Fillinger. Three songs, composed by Mr. Harry Baynton-Power, of Chorley, were sung by Mr. Norman Allin.

The Manchester School of Music, superintended by Mr. Albert J. Cross, has quite a distinct following here; the programmes of its concerts generally show enterprise, though, considering the necessarily immature state of many of those participating, some persons might think that there was a danger of over-shooting the mark; be that as it may, with a constant high aim there is some chance that ultimately perseverance will meet with its reward. Puccini's 'La Bohème' was given by these students on April 8 and 9 in the Midland Theatre, the orchestra consisting of forty players, all amateurs, with perhaps half-a-dozen exceptions; so were all the singers. Anybody cognisant of the exceptional difficulties encountered in carrying through a work of this sort with such material could express little but admiration for the manner in which the task was discharged, this notwithstanding some fairly obvious shortcomings. Miss Alice Shawcross, Miss Hilda Morris, Mr. Alfred Collyer, Mr. Horace Brown, Mr. George Campbell, Mr. E. O. Richards, Mr. R. O. Herford and Mr. N. Robinson were the principal singers. The chorus-singing in the second act was very animated. Mr. Charles Manners had acted as coach, and Mr. Albert J. Cross conducted.

Much interest was shown in the Alderley Edge Choral Society's concert, at which Parry's 'Pied Piper of Hamelin' was performed under the direction of Rev. Colin Bell, the vicar of Chelford. Members of the Hallé band were included in the orchestra, and the soloists were Miss Edna Barker, Mr. Aubrey Bell, and Mr. H. Pashley.

Concerts of chamber-music have not been numerous. Madame Ida Kopetschny's recital of folk-songs, and songs by Bach, Schubert, Brahms and Reger was rather an eye-opener, in the revelation of the peculiarly intimate character of the music she sang; often it was very slow, yet without loss of rhythmic strength; often tinged with sadness, even the gayest of the songs. Max Reger's 'Waldeinsamkeit' enjoyed the distinction of being the first work of this composer to receive in Manchester the distinction of an encore, and chamber-music audiences do not, as a rule, encourage repetitions in an absent-minded sort of way.

The final Brodsky concert consisted of Schumann, Op. 41 (No. 1), Beethoven, Op. 18 (No. 6), and the Dvorák Quintet for pianoforte and strings, with Mr. Egon Petri at the pianoforte. Dr. Brodsky in his customary 'curtain' speech said that there had been a falling off in the attendance, notwithstanding the consistently high standard maintained in the quality of the concerts. In order to continue the generous support hitherto given through these concerts to the Sustentation Fund of the Royal Manchester College of Music, it would be necessary that the concerts in future should have the patronage of all sections of the musical public, chamber-music not being devised for the select few.

The closing concert of the Schiller-Anstalt season consisted of César Franck's D major Quartet and the Brahms Sextet in B flat. The Brussels String Quartet played the Franck music in such manner as to make one think that its strange style came quite naturally to them. Manchester, indeed, was lucky in having such a first interpretation of this long and severe work, but the applause showed plainly that the audience had come to hear and appreciate this much-neglected composer. One rarely hears Brahms's Sextet played with such warmth and 'go,' the Brussels players having Messrs. Alfred Barker and Carl Fuchs for associates.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

One of the best concerts of recent years given by the Jarrow Philharmonic Society was held on March 23, when Elgar's 'King Olaf' occupied the major portion of the evening. The chorus showed the careful and skilful training of the conductor, Mr. George Dods, the orchestra (mostly local) was excellent, and the soloists—Miss Carrie Lancelotti, and Messrs. J. Booth, and Ernest J. Potts—were very satisfactory.

On April 5, the Northumberland Orchestral Society, which numbers about a hundred players, gave a creditable performance of Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony,' Sibelius's 'Valse triste,' Jarnefelt's 'Berceuse and Preludium,' and Hamish MacCunn's overture 'The land of the mountain and the flood,' were also included in the programme. A youthful player, Hermann McLeod, gave a clever performance of the first movement of Mendelssohn's Violin concerto. Mr. C. Horsley conducted.

The next evening three concerts claimed attention. A new choir, organized among the employés of the Newcastle Co-operative Wholesale Society, gave Bennett's 'May Queen,' under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Robinson. The Tynemouth Amateur Vocal Society gave a concert-performance of Gounod's 'Faust.' The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Edith Clegg, Mr. Harold Wilde, Mr. Robert Burnett and Mr. W. D. Spark, and Mr. M. Fairs conducted. On the other bank of the Tyne the Orchestral Society in South Shields gave one of their well-chosen and carefully-prepared programmes, under the baton of Mr. A. Adams. Beethoven's second Symphony formed the chief feature of the evening.

The following evening the Whitley Bay Choral Society sang Parry's motet 'Beyond these voices,' Parts 1 and 2 of the 'Creation,' and S. Wesley's 'In exitu Israel.' Miss Katherine Vincent, Mr. George Riley and Mr. Joseph Lycett were the solo vocalists.

The Newcastle Amateur Operatic Society gave a week's performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's 'Princess Ida,' at the Tyne Theatre, beginning on April 11. The representations were characterized by an agreeable lack of 'amateurishness,' and were musically and dramatically effective. Mr. H. Amers conducted.

A really excellent concert by the Festival Empire Orchestra was given in Newcastle on April 15, under Dr. Cowen's direction, and included Elgar's 'Cockaigne' overture, Mozart's Violin concerto in A (soloist, Mr. Robert Pollak), two songs by Granville Bantock (Miss Dorothy Silk), and other numbers by Tchaikovsky, Cowen and Holbrooke.

Mr. Albert Archdeacon's annual festival party sailed for South Africa on April 23, and will return in July. Choral festivals will be given at Cape Town, Port Elizabeth, Bloemfontein, Kimberley, East London and Durban, the works to be sung being 'Caractacus' (Elgar), 'Messiah,' 'Elijah,' 'Judas Maccabaeus,' 'Hiawatha,' 'Faust' and 'Cavalleria Rusticana.' The singers include Miss Emily Breare, Miss Beatrice McCready, Mr. John Harrison and Mr. Hamilton Earle.

YORKSHIRE.

Owing to the circumstance of Easter falling so early, there is rather more to record than usual at this time of the year. But the chronicle is not a long one, and at the present moment the chief musical topic in Yorkshire would seem to be the question whether the proposed production of Wagner's 'Ring' at Leeds, early next year, will meet with enough support to make it practicable. Mr. Denhof, who gave the work in Edinburgh with English singers, and in English, a short time ago, with conspicuous success, is now proposing to give it on similar lines in some of the principal centres in England, and it will be interesting to see how Leeds, as the largest town in Yorkshire, responds to the call, though no doubt the affair will need to be made a county one if it is to be adequately supported.

That the Leeds people enjoy opera was shown by the good attendance during the week of the Carl Rosa Company's visit—March 28 to April 2—when a programme was provided which, save for Verdi's 'Forza del Destino,' was of quite stereotyped character. The performances, however, were uniformly good, and the orchestra in particular was more efficient and complete than it has ever been before. On April 19, the Leeds New Choral Society, under Mr. Turton's conductorship, gave Mackenzie's cantata 'Jason,' a work which has been unduly neglected. The choir was fresh in quality and thoroughly efficient, but the absence of an orchestra militated against the effectiveness of the work. Miss Lily Jeffrey, Mr. G. W. Riley and Mr. William Hayle were the principals.

The Middlesbrough Musical Union, which is among the most enterprising Societies in the North of England, gave an interesting programme on April 6. The 'Winter' section of Haydn's 'Seasons' and the 'Departure' from Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' trilogy were the more enjoyable, since one is accustomed to hear them at the fag end of a concert, so that one listened to them with more freshness than usual. The soloists, Miss Edith Evans, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Herbert Brown were excellent, and the choir sang with intelligence. Between the two choral works was sandwiched Kallinnikoff's G minor Symphony, a very charming and euphonious work, which was well-played under Mr. Kilburn's highly sympathetic conductorship. The Doncaster Musical Society, which, like that of Middlesbrough has the advantage of being under the direction of an amateur who is as efficient as he is enthusiastic in the cause of good music, gave a performance of Brahms's 'German Requiem' on April 7, which was exceedingly good from the choral point of view, the choir having evidently been thoroughly drilled by Mr. Brameld, who conducted. The orchestra left something to be desired, but the two vocalists, Miss Betty Booker and Mr. Ranaflow, were both satisfying. On April 8, the Wakefield Philharmonic Society, under a lady conductor, Miss Ethel Nettleton, gave Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride.' The orchestra was too incomplete to make possible any realisation of the beauties of the score, but the soloists (Miss Eva Rich, Mr. Brearley and Mr. Charlesworth) put life into their parts, and the choir sang pleasingly. On March 23, Mr. C. H. Moody conducted an excellent performance of Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' in Ripon Cathedral. The service was held in the Choir, which proved to be more effective acoustically than the Nave, where these special services have hitherto taken place. The English version of the text was employed, and the instrumental part was represented by organ and kettledrums, a more effective combination than some might imagine. The soloists were Madame Poole, Miss Etty Ferguson, Mr. F. Smith and Mr. J. W. Senior, and the choir was most efficient. The York Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Noble is the conductor, gave a concert on April 14, the programme of which was mainly devoted to the 'old masters.' Haydn's well-known Symphony in D was very nicely played by the large orchestra which, in spite of a considerable amateur element, Mr. Noble has brought to a high state of efficiency. One of Handel's concertos, with solo parts for two violins and violoncello, was very enjoyable, and a concerto by Bach for pianoforte and strings was a noteworthy feature of the programme. Miss Leila Willoughby was the solo violinist, and Miss Ethel Page the solo pianist.

The Harrogate Symphony Concerts began on March 30, and are to continue every Wednesday afternoon until the close of the season. Mr. Julian Clifford has got together a very efficient orchestra, and it is interesting to notice that it includes a considerable proportion of players from the Leeds Municipal Orchestra, so that between the two series of concerts, these players should acquire an experience which will be to the advantage of both bodies. Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto, with Miss Marie Novello as a most artistic soloist, was a noteworthy feature on March 30. On April 6, Debussy's 'Prélude à l'après-midi d'un Faune' was given for the first time at these concerts, and Mr. Frostick played Mozart's E flat Violin concerto; while on April 13 a Beethoven programme, including the first Symphony and the fourth Pianoforte concerto (soloist, Miss Tosta de Benici), furnished the occasion for some admirably finished performances. On April 20, Kallinnikoff's Symphony in G minor was introduced to Harrogate, and Mr. John Bridge, the leader, played Mendelssohn's Violin concerto.

Foreign Notes.

ANTWERP.

Wagner's 'Götterdämmerung' was recently given for the first time at the Flemish Theatre (director, M. Henry Fontaine). The addition of this work to the répertoire enabled the management to give two complete cycles of the 'Ring' during April.—On the anniversary of the death of the national composer, Peter Benoit, a memorial concert devoted to his compositions was given. Among the works performed were 'Poème symphonique' for pianoforte and orchestra, the Overture to 'Charlotte Corday,' and a dramatic scene, 'Jonourou Cathelyne.'

AVIGNON.

Giordano's opera 'Andrea Chenier' was successfully presented for the first time at the Municipal Theatre.

BARCELONA.

The programmes of the grand concerts at the Catalan Palace of Music (conductor, Herr Beidler) have contained many interesting compositions, among them Bruckner's seventh Symphony and works by contemporary Spanish composers, including Garcia Roble's 'Epitalame' and a poetical fragment for orchestra after Dante's 'Divina Commedia,' by Granados.

BARMEN.

At the last subscription concert of the Allgemeine Konzertverein, two new compositions, a concert-overture 'Kassandra' and a suite 'Komtesse Pierrette,' by the Society's conductor, Herr Karl Hopfe, were successfully produced.

BERLIN.

The Königliche Kapelle, conducted by Dr. Richard Strauss, played Bruckner's fourth Symphony ('Romantic'), the conductor's symphonic-poem 'Don Juan,' and Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, at their ninth symphony concert. Schumann's Symphony in C major, and Beethoven's ninth Symphony formed the programme of the tenth and last concert of the season.—At the tenth Philharmonic Concert (conductor, Professor Arthur Nikisch), Max Schilling's 'Glockenlieder' were sung by Herr Ludwig Hess. Beethoven's Symphonies, Nos. 1 and 9, were excellently performed at an extra concert given for the pension fund of the Philharmonic Orchestra.—Liszt's 'Dante Symphony,' and a Violin concerto with string orchestra and cembalo, by Haydn—a novelty for Berlin—figured in the programme of the fifth and last 'Symphonischer Musikabend' of the Blüthner Orchestra (conductor, Herr Josef Strinsky). The soloist was Alexander Petschnikoff.—At an orchestral concert given by the Russian conductor, M. Sergius Kussewitzky, Kallinnikoff's Symphony in G minor and the 'Poème de l'extase,' by Scriabine, were excellently performed. At the same concert the famous Russian basso, M. Chaliapine, made his first appearance in Berlin, and had a sensational success with songs by Moussorgsky.—An early work by Richard Strauss, the symphonic fantasia
